Marion Harland's Corner

A Miscellany Worth Reading

LET our sub-caption may savor to readers of vanity, I preface today's talk by the announcement that this miscellany is drawn from bona fide letters from correspondents who have something to say, and know how to say it.

Thinking my fifty years of wrestling with domestic problems may have evolved something which may be of use, I send the enclosed: Sweet apples and other insipid fruits may be utilized by cooking them with sour, thereby saving sugar and improving flavor. Pieplant may be used instead of the apples when they are scarce. Dried apples are particularly good if half are sweet. Some sweet apples are hard to cook, and must be stewed longer than others.

Very ripe grapes, cooked and rubbed through a colander, mixed with apples and baked down thick, make a nice marmalade and require little sugar. Sweet apple cider boiled down to one-third original quantity and thickened with not so sour apples makes most delectable apple butter. It may be spiced if desired.

Barley Muffins

Two cups barley flour; one scant cup cornmeal (white preferred); two cups sour milk and one teaspoon soda, or sweet milk and two teaspoons baking powder; scant teaspoon salt; one egg. This makes one dozen muffins.

Pancakes

Pour two cups boiling water over two cups meal. Add two cups sour milk; teaspoon salt; one or two eggs. Thicken proper consistency with barley flour or oat "middling." Scalding the meal makes more digestible.

One cup hashed lean meat; one half cup hot water. Stew a little. Stir in a beaten egg or two, or a cold hard-boiled one minced; any little bit of cold gravy or sweet cream at hand. Toast slices of bread; if very dry soften with butter. If meat is very lean a little butter will add richness. Salt and pepper hash and spread over toast. Serve hot. Mrs. R. B. G. Washington, not D. C.).

As will be seen from the parenthetical dress, our member is of our vast and valuable Western constituency.

We elderly housewives are learning new lessons daily. Young ones must begin with the rudiments and work upward. Let each of us "lend a lift."

SINCE the recommendation of dry yeast by many experienced and intelligent housewives, I have received ponderous batch of directions for making the same at home. While it is practicable to publish all, I make room for one which includes if needed, respecting the history of the article:

I have been interested in the dry yeast discussion in your Corner because I have known its merits before it was put upon the market. It was used in the homes of the early settlers of the Middle States, and by many of their descendants until about forty years ago. Then enterprising firm began to manufacture and sell it. Then compressed yeast came in; and dry has been sold in the country where it is difficult to get the compressed. But the dry has so many advantages of its own that any good cooks prefer to use it. If the yeast used as a "starter" be fresh, it made according to enclosed directions it will be found highly satisfactory. My recipe may be of use to some readers who cannot conveniently obtain the ready-made cakes. New Jersey—or in this part of the little state—it was called "turnpike emptyings," as it was usually pronounced, "empt'ins." It seems that when the first turnpike was laid between Newark and Pompton, some of the farmers who came from other states brought their dry yeast along. Hence the ungainly name.

Dry Yeast

Boil one pint of water; one large potato; two handfuls of hops tied in cheesecloth together. When potato is soft, press out hops and mash potato in the water. Then add, when lukewarm, one tablespoonful sugar; one and one-half teaspoon salt; one cake yeast, dissolved in a little water. Add two or three tablespoonfuls flour—enough to make a medium batter. Cover warmly and let all stand until frothy and foamy. Then stir in one and one-half pint yellow cornmeal (white cornmeal may be used) or enough meal to be able to roll out on a floured board and cut into cakes. Bake these dry thoroughly, turning at times, when they are dry store in paper or muslin bags, hang in a cool place. If new good yeast is used to start the mixture with it will be quite satisfactory.

Note.—Chard leaves or grapevine leaves may be used in place of the hops. Yellow meal seems to be more satisfactory than white.—Mrs. L. S. (New Jersey).

Let me say, for the benefit of those not versed in provincial dialects, that in some parts of New England (and, it would seem, in New Jersey as well), "empt'ins" was, in our grandmothers' mouths, a generic term for yeast of any kind.

THE East gives up, and the West keeps not back recipes for home-made dry yeast:

About Dry Yeast

I make my own yeast, and have for many years. In the fall of the year we gather some wild hops (living in Kansas where they grow).

For a small family's use I put a large potato on to boil in about three pints of water. Then tie two handfuls of hops up in a cloth, and boil with the potato. When the potato is thoroughly done, take out and mash very fine; then stir two large batter spoons of flour in with it and scald with the hop water, using only enough of it to make a stiff batter. When it is cool add the yeast "starter," which should previously have been put to soak—about as much again as you would use for a batch of bread. Set away to get light. When it gets nice and foamy, thicken with cornmeal, and again set away to rise. When it is light again, add more meal; turn out on the molding board and work in meal until it is rather stiff. Then break it in small particles on plates or granite pie-tins to dry. When it is dry put in double paper sacks or paper and cloth and keep in any convenient cool place.—Mrs. E. C. G. (Kansas).

Your recipe contains certain features absent from the formula for which we are indebted to our New Jersey member. Therefore we insert it.

You may consider mine a vulgar taste, but I am encouraged to confess it because my John, who is, in my eyes, the pink of refinement, shares it. We are both fond of sauerkraut. I had a cook who made it to our satisfaction, but she has gone into a munition factory somewhere.

Can you tell me how to make the old-fashioned Dutch dish? John's grandmother taught him its virtues and he hankers after it!—A. N. C. (Pittsburg, Pa.).

BY a pleasing coincidence, I find upon the file containing your request, the following from the Food Administration:

On account of its supposedly German name, sauerkraut seems to be losing popularity as an American dish. It is said, however, to be of Dutch, rather than German, origin; but in any event sauerkraut is a valuable food.

The Food Administration regards the free use of sauerkraut as a means of saving greater amounts of staple foods needed abroad. Sauerkraut is a patriotic dish in spite of its name, sometimes changed to Liberty Cabbage.

I have, then, abundant reason for the pleasure with which I pass on to you and your John, with my best wishes, a recipe for the "patriotic dish."

Sauerkraut

Shred or chop cabbage fine. Line a keg, or barrel, or jar, with cabbage-leaves on the bottom and sides. Put in a layer of the cut cabbage three inches in depth; press down well and sprinkle with four tablespoonfuls of salt.

When you have packed five layers in this way, press them down hard with a board cut to fit loosely on the inside of the barrel or jar. Put heavy weights upon this board, or pound the cabbage with a wooden beetle, until it is a compact mass, when remove the board and put in more layers of salt and shredded cabbage, repeating the pounding upon every five layers until the vessel is full. Cover with fresh cabbage-leaves and put the board upon these with a heavy weight to keep it down. Set all away to ferment. In three weeks, remove the scum and, if need be, cover with water. Keep in a dry, cool cellar. Some add to the salt whole black peppers, cloves, garlic and mace. This done, set away for some weeks to "ripen."

Calls for a really good recipe for carrot marmalade are frequent.

Carrot or Mock Orange Marmalade

As oranges are so expensive would not a good substitute for orange marmalade be acceptable to Cornerites?

Two pounds of ripe carrots, boiled and ground fine; two pounds of sugar, pulp of three lemons and grated rind of one; six almonds, blanched and pounded to a paste; one teaspoonful of almond-extract.

Cook lemon-pulp and sugar together fifteen minutes. Add, then, the rest of the ingredients and cook ten minutes more, stirring often.—A. G. (Maine).

Someone must stay at home to do the work of daughter, sister, maid

To keep home sweet and clean, wouldn't you say that "someone" needs all the time-saving help that Gold Dust will surely give? These five helps particularly.

1 Greaseless

A tablespoonful of Gold Dust! What labor-saving—what time-conserving—it holds. For instance, in removing grease from: Roasting and Frying Pans, Skimmers, Kneading Boards, Tops of Stoves, Colanders, Chopping Bowls, Drip Trays, Ladles, Painted Woodwork, Dish Towels, Dishes, Grease "tracked in", Garbage Cans. Unless a gentle grease-dissolvent like Gold Dust is used, these articles are difficult to clean. You need but a tablespoonful to a dishpan or half a pail of hot water, for easy, perfect cleansing.

2 Gritless

Again, a tablespoonful of time-saving Gold Dust. There are many articles which require a smooth cleaner—with no grittiness to mar glassy or polished surfaces. For example: Porcelain and other Tubs, Wash Bowls, Nickel and other Fittings, Windows, Silver, Enameled surfaces, Mirrors. Gold Dust is a smooth, gentle cleansing agent—without grit. A tablespoonful to half a pail of hot water removes oil, grease, soil and dust with the minimum of friction and rubbing.

3 Rubless

A tablespoonful of energy-saving, time-saving Gold Dust dissolves quickly and thoroughly in any kind of water. It makes a gentle, cleansing solution that dissolves all oil and grease without the need of rubbing. Soap rubbed on a cloth cannot clean these articles: Baby Bottles, Cruets, Food Choppers, Milk and other Bottles, Funnels, Utensils with spouts. For the same reason Gold Dust leaves drain pipes unclogged and sanitary.

4 Tasteless

A tablespoonful of time-saving Gold Dust cleans thoroughly without leaving behind the smallest trace of soap. Nooks and corners in Ice Boxes and Refrigerators, Churns and Separators; small articles with openings and rough gratings, such as Strainers, Sieves, Graters; patented articles with intricate parts, such as Grinding Mills, Meat and Food Choppers, Egg Beaters, even the humble Can-opener. Gold Dust effectively dissolves the least particle of grease and washes out completely.

5 Odorless

Many foods, such as fish, cheese, onions, etc., have a tendency to leave their odors in the vessels they are cooked in. Housekeepers have found that Gold Dust, because it removes the tiniest suggestion of grease, removes, too, the least suggestion of odor of foods. Put a teaspoonful of time-saving, cleansing Gold Dust into the vessel itself, add hot water and use a small brush. A quick scrubbing, and out comes your vessel fresh and odorless.

Young People's Topics for December 1

"All for Christ—My Money." Epworth League Topic. Matt. 13:44; 11 Cor. 8:7-9; 9:6-8. "All for Christ—Our Pleasures." Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. 1 Cor. 10:23, 24, 31-33; 11:1

THE first of these topics was treated as the Christian Endeavor Lesson for October 6 in the Christian Herald of September 25. The second was treated as the Epworth League topic for August 4 in the Christian Herald of July 24. Each of these topics completes a series of consecration topics, of which the Epworth Leaguers have covered a part. The series as used in the Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Societies began with "Our Abilities," and included our ambitions, tongues, money, time and pleasures, the whole being a well-divided course in complete consecration. Consecration is one of the things we talk a great deal about, but which is really little comprehended by many of us. We sing "Consecrate us now to thy service, Lord," and forget that consecrate means to set apart; forget it so completely that we may even refuse the next opportunity for service which he sends us. We join in the song, "All, yes all, I give to Jesus," and when the collection is taken we often search for our smallest coin. We will have little perplexity over the division of our money between the kingdom and the expenses of life if we remember that all we have is his and that we are only stewards, charged with the proper handling of his property. We will have no qualms of conscience over our pleasures if we seek relaxation always with the thought that all we do, or think, we are doing as unto him, that our lives may show forth his spirit and minister to his praise. Let us not forget that we are not our own, that we are bought with a price, even with the blood of Christ.

There never was a time when the Christian needed more than now to be wholly consecrated to the work of the Christ, ready for any service, for any sacrifice. Thousands of our Leaguers and Endeavorers and Baptist Young People have in the past eighteen months shown their ability to sacrifice for a great cause. They are "Over There," fighting, suffering, winning, dying, living, ministering to life and to death, to homesickness and to suffering. In the army, the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A., those who once were comrades in all our activities at home are living a wider life than we or they ever knew here, a life of ready sacrifice and consecration. Until peace shall have restored her sway over the lands torn by strife, they are consecrated to the one purpose of achieving victory. When they come back they will know what consecration means. Perhaps in their going and in the deeds they are doing and have done, we have all learned a little more than we had known about it.

But when they are home again, the old world will still be hungering, as it has hungered for many centuries, for the truth. As children of God through Christ, we are his chosen messengers of the truth, of the Gospel of salvation, of heavenly forgiveness and of real peace. The soldier does not say "Send some one else" when ordered to a post of danger. The Red Cross nurse does not shrink from the sight of suffering, or ask that her hours be regular and her rest undisturbed; the Y. M. C. A. secretary does not complain if they move his hut every six days, and if his hours stretch from reveille to taps, nor does the Y. W. C. A. canteen worker seek her own ease or leave her appointed task for other hands. Shall we? Is there a Sunday School class needing a teacher? We will take it and do our best and leave the question of success to him who blesses earnest effort. Is there a difficult place in the mission field, or an opportunity to serve in the ministry? We will go to our knees and wait the leading of his spirit. Let our consecration be as wide as the world, as unquestioning as the obedience of the soldier—a consecration that craves sacrifice; that welcomes suffering, if it come with duty; that dares to die, if the path of life lead presently through danger; and that puts our hand in His as we go forward.

Crooked Spines Straightened!

NO matter how old you are: no matter what caused your affliction; no matter how many years you have suffered or how hopeless you believe your case to be, there is hope for you in the Philo Burt Method.

The Philo Burt Method is new and different, not like anything you have tried. It has benefited or cured over 30,000 sufferers from spinal trouble caused by tuberculosis, Pott's disease, infantile paralysis, spinal meningitis, pleurisy, rheumatism, injuries, nervous sitting and standing postures, etc. Treat yourself at home. A 30-days trial costs you nothing; no obligations of any kind if it fails.

Eminent specialists who have studied and treated spinal diseases and deformities for years are first astonished, then convinced and quickly become enthusiastic upon finding one success follow another when the Philo Burt Method is used. Ask us for the name of happy patrons right in your vicinity.

A young woman who was bed-ridden at 26 with spinal tuberculosis after suffering for 20 years, is married, happy and perfectly strong and vigorous at 29. A boy of 8 was unable to walk or hold his head erect. After a few months every symptom disappeared and he walks daily three miles to school. A man of 45, in cruel agony for six years, spent over $3,000 in a vain search for relief. Now works every day without the aid of any artificial support.

The perfected Philo Burt Appliance will positively cure any case that is curable and straighten any crooked spine that can be straightened. It gives firmer and more natural support to the spine than an ordinary corset. Goes on and off like a coat and cannot be detected under the clothing. It not only relieves an aching back but has accomplished many amazing cures. Let us send you swiftest proof.

FREE—30 Days' Trial

We especially invite skeptics to investigate. Write yourself or ask your doctor to do so. Send no money. Simply describe your case fully. Get our liberal offer of a helpful book on spinal troubles absolutely free. Address today—

Vapo-Cresolene

The Inhalation Treatment for Whooping-Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs.

Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs. Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping-Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it nips the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous cold. Mrs. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp." The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights. It is called a boon by Asthma sufferers. For the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and as an aid in the treatment of Diphtheria, Cresolene is valuable on account of its powerful germicidal qualities. It is a protection to those exposed. Cresolene's best recommendation is its 39 years of successful use. Sold by Druggists. Send for descriptive booklet. Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat, composed of slippery elm bark, licorice, sugar and Cresolene. They can't harm you. Of your druggist or from us, 10c. In stamps.

Questions and Answers

J. R. B., Des Moines, Iowa. "In its articles interpreting the war in the light of prophecy, the Christian Herald has done a real service, not only to those readers who are Bible-lovers, but to good people everywhere, who have found them helpful and spiritually stimulating. From the time of our entrance into the war, I have believed this nation to be under divine direction. Expecting and asking nothing for ourselves, we have done our utmost to help the cause of international justice and righteousness. Our good President has proved a most wise and capable leader, and I am confident that his whole course in this war has the universal and cordial approval of the nation. He has set up a new and nobler standard of world statesmanship which our people duly appreciate. I believe, too, that God is surely directing our course in this great struggle and has guided it all through, and I know many others who hold the same conviction."

J. C. McK., London, Ky. In a recent issue I notice an item of mine in the Mail-Bag which does not clearly express my views on the subject mentioned. I believe and teach that Paul means—"As the sun is brighter than the moon, the moon brighter than the stars, and even some stars are brighter than others; so is the celestial body more glorious than the terrestrial"; and that no reference whatever is made to a difference of degrees in heaven.

The interpretation in the paragraph referred to is that which is given by commentators generally.

M. L. S., Georgia. Write to Information Bureau, War Department, Washington, D. C.

E. W. P., Oregon. "I would gladly have given my life if thereby the liquor curse could have been blotted out. I have at times nearly wept my heart away because there are so many little orphans and broken-up homes, and also because there are about fifty thousand young girls and women either led into a life of shame and vice, or otherwise forced into it, every year. It is a shame to our nation that they are not better protected. I hope it will not be more than a few months at the most until the breweries are closed, and I trust that the authorities will soon stop all breweries from wasting food and fuel."

B. H. B., Sewickley, Pa. "Frequently we find, when referring to some great noble or good person, that his or her goodness or greatness is ascribed to the influence of a mother. I am a mother of five little ones and one gone beyond the veil, and I am trying to do all I can to bring the little ones up to seek the Lord; yet I always feel ashamed when I read anything like that, for there are just as many good lives trained by the fathers. Why can't we give the glory to mothers and fathers both? My own father was a saint on earth—the real light and strength of our home. My husband's father, too, was one of God's own children. Let us praise the fathers as well as the mothers, but rather give all the glory to God, who only uses us as instruments to perform his will."

L., Sinnickson, Va. To enter the Merchant Marine, you should write to Mr. Henry Howard, Director of Recruiting, U. S. Shipping Board, Custom House, Boston, Mass., stating your citizenship and experience.

The shape of the balloon somewhat resembles a cigar. The entire length will be 160 feet and the diameter 31 feet. Suspended from the envelope will be a rigidly built car, large enough to carry a pilot, an observer, all necessary accessories for determining altitude, speed, etc., and a 100-horsepower gasoline motor of the latest improved type. It will make a speed of 45 miles an hour at an altitude of 600 feet, and this speed may be maintained for ten hours. The weight is 5,275 pounds, inclusive of men and equipment.

H. C. Y., Tolleson, Ariz. The fig-tree incident related in Mark 11, has been a subject of much controversy. It is explained by some writers that the tree in Palestine produces fruit at two or even three seasons of the year, and it is said that the fruit precedes the leaves. One might infer from this that if the tree had leaves, it might be expected to give evidence at least of having had fruit. It has been held that the blighting of the precious and fruitless tree was designed to convey a rebuke to the barren traditions of the Pharisees, their ostentatious display of the law, and their vain exuberance of words without the good fruit of works.

E. S. D. The conduct of the steward described in Luke 16 was dishonest, but Christ does not hold him dishonest for imitation. He was inculcating the same lesson that he had taught before, viz., that the who ministered to the poor and the afflicted, especially to the followers of Christ, would receive a reward of all proportion to their service. The children of the world were more crafty, and the steward worked device at his master's expense to effect this object. He placed his master's debtors under an obligation, so that they might feel bound to help him when he needed as he had helped them. It was his own lord or master who admired the shrewdness of his dishonest scheme.

In others, the malady seems too deeply seated to yield to any treatment. The head should be kept clear as possible by spraying it with some simple antiseptic such as salt water or borax water.

C. J. N., Hillsboro, N. D. Tides are caused by the gravitational attraction or pull of the moon and sun. According to the views held by modern scientists, the moon directly over a place exerts a pull on the water under it, thus heaving up the water and causing a tide on the shore. When the sun and moon are on the same side of the earth their attraction is united and tides are higher. The same pull exerted on the earth as on the water, but the water being more fluid yields to the gravitation of the sun and moon until the force is balanced by the gravitation of the earth itself. The earth's gravitation is constant, the pull of the sun and moon is variable, and because of the rotation of the earth and the orbit of the tide runs around the earth once in about twenty-five hours.

Subscriber, Bennington, Vt. Early inquirers and converts to the Christian faith in the first century were taught a summary of the doctrines preached by Christ and emphasized by his apostles, and they were required to assent to them before baptism. This is the first simple form of the rule, an expositor of the faith which found expression in the Apostles' Creed long afterward. One may gather from the Gospels and the Epistles what was taught in those early days, and also from the writings of Clement of Alexandria and other writers of the second and third centuries that the divinity of Christ was distinctly taught, and likewise the atonement and justification by faith. No one denying the divinity of Christ and his office as Saviour and Mediator can properly be called Christian, since these are among the essentials of Christianity. It is not enough to esteem Jesus as a great preacher, prophet and teacher. There are not a few learned Jews who take this view, yet make no claim to be regarded as Christians. Those

The "Y" man's shelter tent

The Y. M. C. A. Everywhere

SQUADS right!" And the regiment was off. The morning had arrived when the men were to go to the rifle range. It was excitement. The supply company wagons were detailed here and there and were being loaded with blanket rolls, field kitchens, mess supplies, and necessary odds and ends of various kinds. Packs were made and the soldiers were ready at seven o'clock, and in line were two Y. M. C. A. secretaries.

"Goin' along?"
"Yes, indeed, we'll be there with you."
This was a Y. M. C. A. secretary's reply to a soldier's query a day or two before the regiment was to go to the range.

"The 'Y' sure's always on; hey, Bill?" remarked the soldier as he stepped away from the desk.
"I'll say so," was the rejoinder.

One evening a few days earlier, two secretaries were on their way to distribute post cards to a regiment which had gone on a hike and was spending the night a few miles from camp. As they trudged along, a sergeant on horseback met them on his way to camp. As soon as he recognized who they were he exclaimed "The Y. M. C. A. everywhere!" He did not realize the fact, perhaps, but in that brief sentence he expressed one aim of the Army and Navy Young Men's Christian Association.

After a hike of some miles the range was reached, and while the soldiers constructed their little canvas city, the Y. M. C. A. men, assisted by a detail, pitched the tent which was to serve both as their home and the soldiers' stamping ground during the stay. Writing benches and desks were erected, the phonograph and records put out, the flag pole raised, and stamps, odds and stationery arranged ready for business. This "Y" was in harmony with the range equipment of the army. In it the men found the same spirit of cheer and cordial hospitality which they had become accustomed to at camp. The location was on a hill overlooking the entire encampment, only a short distance away, and was within a rod of the regimental canteen, which was a favorite rendezvous for the soldiers after a full day out at the range. At any rate I should find it a pretty popular resort, for hundreds of bottles of milk and other cold drinks, as well as pies of ice cream, disappeared every day. At such a place there is always some sight which is unique and typical. And in this case it consisted of a man, a bottle of milk and a piece of pie. A picture could have been drawn time and again of a soldier with a bottle of milk in one hand and a slab of pie in another, going at them hot and heavy, having the time of his military life, as if he had not already eaten two or three good substantial meals that day. The rush, however, was after retreat. As soon as mess was over up the hill they piled, some to the canteen first and then to the "Y," some to the "Y" direct.

"HELLO! you down here?" some one shouts to the "Y" secretary, who is selling stamps and distributing stationery at a table in front of the tent.
"Ain't much goin' on back at camp, I reckon," chimes in another. "How d'yuh like it here anyway? Ain't so worse, I'll say."

"Pretty well fixed down there?" queries the secretary.
"I'll say so," comes the characteristic army expression again. "And believe me, old Garrity'll have to put some wind into that tooter o' hisn in the mornin'." I'uz on guard last night, and I've been out in them bloomin' pits all day. Hey, buddy, goin' down? Take this canteen, will yuh? No, put it in my tent. Think I'm makin' yuh a present? Wanta not last long. The improvised benches are full. The ground is covered; some are using their knees as support for a small board which serves as a desk; others lie flat on their stomachs. Two or three have found their way into the "Y" tent and are making use of what they see there. Many have procured stationery and stamps and have gone down the hill to write in front of their own shelter tents. Everywhere men are writing. And how that letter box fills up! For no matter how dirty and tired a soldier is, he writes letters. His mother or father, his foster parents, his neighbor, his brother or sister, his wife (if he has one), his girl—always his girl—must have a letter. It is interesting to look at the mail sent from a Y. M. C. A. hut and see how large a proportion goes to "Miss" Somebody. And that is as it should be. But it is unfortunate that the home folks and acquaintances do not spend more time writing to the men. It makes no difference whether a fellow is "over here" or "over there"—he wants LETTERS.

THE most tangible service, perhaps, the Y. M. C. A. renders when it accompanies the men on a three or four-day hike or goes to the rifle range with them, is the providing of entertainment and writing facilities. When the Seventy-ninth Division went to Baltimore, Md., to be reviewed by President Wilson,

Y. M. C. A. secretaries marched with the troops, pitched tents in the various parks where the soldiers were encamped, and gave them this definite service. But the "Y" does more than this. While at the range the secretaries shot with the soldiers, they messed with them, they chatted with them, they discussed vital personal questions with them, they were one of them more, perhaps, than at any other time. The opportunity and inclination for intimate contact were greater than in camp. And although the program could not be so extensive, yet what was done made a greater proportionate impression.

The Y. M. C. A. stands for something very concrete in the life of the soldier. By being in such contact with him it has become a real part of his life. If he were deprived of its homey and wholesome influence, his feelings, his actions, his attitude toward everything—his morale—would suffer. "The Y. M. C. A. everywhere," is an aim of the organization.

The White House in War Time

By

ABBY GUNN BAKER

A cake server

THE White House, which has been closed to the public since our country entered the world war in April of 1917, has never been more attractive than it is now. The stately old mansion, sitting well back in its tree-covered park, is the admiration of Washington's thousands of war workers who pass it daily, but who have never been privileged to enter it, and who are looking forward eagerly to the day when its hospitable doors will once more swing outward.

Mrs. Wilson is pre-eminently, in the sense in which our grandmothers used the term, a "home body." Her taste is seen in every room of the Executive Mansion. President Wilson has been extremely conservative in allowing expenditures for the White House since he has occupied it, and not a dollar has been expended, particularly since the declaration of war, that could possibly be avoided. Last year, however, the walls in the state parlors were repapered, but the same design of wall paper was kept in all of the rooms. The handsome patriotic design of the blue field and stars, which was selected when the White House was restored in 1903 and which has been so popular, still graces the walls of the blue chamber. The rugs were replaced by new ones, while dainty new curtains of lace were hung under the heavy draperies in the windows of the state apartments. All the furniture has been re-upholstered in the same patterns. These small renovations have given to the first floor of the White House a very attractive appearance.

AMONG the improvements which Mrs. Wilson has made in the mansion, none have been of more importance than those on the ground floor. In the long east and west corridor, the worn carpet has been replaced with a new rug of the same rich red hue as its predecessor, and the black walnut furniture has been refurnished. All the portraits of the mistresses of the mansion which are owned by the Government, with the exception of those of Martha Washington, Abigail Adams and Dolly Madison, hang upon the walls of this corridor. Huntington's life-size painting of Mrs. Washington is honored with a place in the Red Room. The portrait of Mrs. Madison is in the library, on the family floor of the mansion. The only picture of Abigail Adams in the White House, a small silhouette made from life, hangs in the President John Adams section of the southeast cabinet in the room which, two years ago, Mrs. Wilson set aside for the collection of the china of the different administrations.

When Mrs. Wilson set aside the room on this corridor for the collection, which was started by Mrs. Roosevelt, a cabinet was built in the west wall. In the two years which have elapsed, the relics have outgrown their quarters, and during the past summer Mrs. Wilson has had two handsome colonial cabinets built in the east wall of the room. Within the three cabinets are some heirlooms of all the Chief Executives, except two. While some administrations are represented most inadequately, notably that of President John Adams, yet the collection is fairly representative of the majority, and as it is constantly growing, it is expected that within a few years it will bear creditable exhibits of every Chief Executive.

THE room which Mrs. Wilson set aside for the china collection is designated for "The China of the Presidents." Cabinets for the relics have been built in the walls. In the west cabinet are the heirlooms of the Presidents from John Quincy Adams to President Chester A. Arthur, 1825-1881. The middle panel of this cabinet contains the Lincoln china, the relics being arranged on shelves at each side of the panel. The south cabinet on the east side of the room contains the pieces of porcelain and glass which belong to our first five Presidents, as well as some of the oldest pieces of glass plate remaining in the White House, and the cabinet at the east of the room, just south of the entrance from the corridor, contains the china and glass of President Cleveland's administration and also that of all save one of his predecessors.

This last cabinet will awaken the greatest interest of any when the White House is again open to visitors, as it holds the specimen pieces of the new state dining china which the President and Mrs. Wilson ordered last spring. This state dining set is the first White House china ever designed by an American artist, made from American clays at an American pottery, burned at American kilns, and decorated by American workmen. From the largest dish to the tiniest, every piece of the new china is American made, and each piece is a work of art of which any government might be proud.

The new state dining set was made at the Lenox Industries at Trenton, New Jersey. Every piece is of exquisite texture and the service pronounced by competent judges to be as fine as anything that can be made abroad. The whole service will comprise seventeen hundred pieces, each piece beginning in two tints—a deep ivory-colored border and the cream white china of the center. There is no color in any of the decorations save on the service plates. The decorations are in rolled gold. Each flat piece is edged with a narrow border of stars and stripes in alternating green and gold, and at the top of each is an exquisite conception of the President's seal.

The New Day of Common Understanding

TAKING for a text the phrase "The rediscovered value of spiritual things," Cleveland, Ohio, under the leadership of Mr. Myron T. Herriek, of the War Camp Community Service, will hold on Thanksgiving Day a great civic celebration, in which the people will give thanks for victories gained, for peace, and more especially for that new valuation of spiritual quantities which has come out of the work of the services that save in the camps and in the field, as well as out of the greater comprehension of America's underlying ideals which have been crystallized by war largely through the expressions of President Wilson, the nation's great leader, recognized everywhere as a pioneer in the world's thought. Mr. Herriek has said: "This means things spiritual in governments as well as in religion. It means the soul and spirit of our nation, it means rediscovery that the God of the people lives and that right will prevail. There can be no religious differences in the observance of this Thanksgiving. Protestants, Catholics and Jews can all stand together on the same platform in unity, faith and patriotism in celebration of the victory for which they have worked together so faithfully in their ministrations to the men in service."

The idea of the community celebrations was taken up by the War Camp Community Service and similar celebrations will be held under their auspices in more than 600 communities, most of them adjacent to or within reach of the camps. The plan in Cleveland is to have the individual church services at 9.30, followed by a great civic Community Service at 11 o'clock.

The President in his call to Thanksgiving this year (see opposite page) has called attention to the widespread nature of the obligations and opportunities of peace and asked for a wider observance of Thanksgiving Day than has been customary, making the rendering of thanks a great united paean of praise for peace and victory in addition to our material blessings. It is pretty well recognized now that the work of the Y. M. C. A., the War Camp Community Service, the Y. W. C. A. and the associated organizations in building up the morale of the army has been one of the greatest spiritual works of the century and that morale is merely another name for spiritual efficiency. In the support of and participation in this work the nation itself has gained a new morale, a new spiritual efficiency. The struggles, the sacrifices, the new adjustments made necessary by the exigencies of war have given the nation a new vision, have clarified its ideals of liberty, have made more plain the spiritual essentials of true liberty and have overwhelmed former divisions in a new spirit of unity of thought and purpose. As President Wilson has said: "The nation has seen the birth of a new day of common understanding." We have won a victory at arms partly because we had first won a victory of ideals.

As we gather for our Thanksgiving celebrations this year let us be sure that we are ready to meet permanent these rediscovered values which have been won for us in conflict, and let us not forget those of us who are near a camp, that the men whose morale has been so splendidly sustained through the months of warfare are just as lonesome, just as homesick and more easily tempted now that the great incentive to self-control has been removed by the signing of the armistice. The War Camp Community Service is especially anxious that we welcome to our homes the boys of other homes from the camps and training grounds. While we celebrate, as a nation, our victories and emphasize our new spiritual ideals let us not forget that it is in khaki who was ready to be a hero, but who, if he sees Germany now, will be more likely to see it as a military policeman, which is a harder job than being a hero.

Our Troops March Into Germany

ON Sunday morning, November 17, at 5:30 A.M., the Allied armies began the march from the positions reached at noon of November 11, to the positions along the line stipulated in the terms of the armistice. The German troops were rapidly evacuating the territory in front of the Allied armies and it was expected that the march to the new positions would be devoid of unpleasant incidents. The American Third Army, which on November 19 had reached German soil, advanced on a fifty mile front, running from Mouzon on the Meuse to Thiaucourt west of the Moselle, facing Luxemburg, a corner of Belgium, and the Briey and Longwy coal and iron fields. The Third Army consists of the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 26th, 32d, 42d (Rainbow), 89th, and 90th divisions, and about a quarter of a million men under the command of Major General Dickman. The Tenth Fifth Army was on the American left, the Tenth Tenth Army on the American right. The direction of the advance indicated that the American armies would pass through and occupy Luxemburg reaching the Rhine at its confluence with the Moselle at Coblenz. The French under the personal leadership of Marshal Foch were expected to enter Metz on the 18th, and Strassburg on the 19th. As the march after the retreating Germans began, Belgian patrols were already in Brussels which had seen some bloodshed, there being disorder involving units of the German army and also brushes between the loyal Belgians and pro-German Flemings, calling themselves "Flamagands." Most of the Flamagands considered it good policy to evacuate along with the German armies. Belgian troops occupied Antwerp on November 17. It was expected that King Albert would make a formal entry into his redeemed capital on November 25. Field Marshal Foch, on November 16, addressed a message to the Allied armies:

"Officers, Non-commissioned Officers and Soldiers of the Allied Armies: After having resolutely stopped the enemy, you have for months fought him with faith and indefatigable energy, without respite. You have won the greatest battle in history and saved the most sacred cause—liberty of the world. Be proud. You have adorned your flags with immortal glory. Posterity preserves for you its recognition."

It was reported that the German plenipotentiaries admitted to Marshal Foch that their army was at his mercy and declared that their reserves, both of men and of munitions, were exhausted.

The German armies, as they fell back, still plundered, taking all food and food animals they could seize from the people and paying for it, at all, in worthless German army script. They still left fires in their wake. The Allied armies, as they advanced, went forward as to meet an enemy. First advance guards, then engineers to repair roads, then the main bodies in columns, echeloned on the parallel roads and so placed that, the enemy or any of his forces should not be able to start a fight, immediate deployments could be made into battle formation. Artillery was in line, ready to lay down a barrage at the first sign of trouble. Observation balloons were up along the line to keep eye on Fritz, and planes were carried forward with the advancing troops. The pace of the advance was about twenty kilometers a day for two days and then rest two days. That would mean about twenty-five miles advance every four days.

The advancing troops were met by couriers from many towns asking speed in order that they might be relieved from the threat of violence at the hands of German deserters. Released American and Allied prisoners coming back into the lines reported more or less disorder among the withdrawing Germans. Over 2,500 American prisoners of war were released immediately on the signing of the armistice, the French and British were not released until movement of evacuation was begun. The advancing armies carried complete supplies, so that they could not need to depend on the occupied country for anything needed.

President Calls to Prayer and Thanksgiving

By the President of the United States of America

A PROCLAMATION

It has long been our custom to turn in the Autumn of the year in praise and thanksgiving to Almighty God for His many blessings and mercies to us as a Nation. This year we have special and moving cause to be grateful and to rejoice. God has in His good pleasure given us peace. It has not come as a mere cessation of arms, a relief from the strain and tragedy of war. It has come as a great triumph of Right. Complete victory has brought us, not peace alone, but the confident promise of a new day as well, in which justice shall replace force and jealous intrigue among the nations. Our gallant armies have participated in a triumph which is not marred or strained by any purpose of selfish aggression. In a righteous cause they have won immortal glory and have nobly served their Nation in serving Mankind. God has indeed been gracious. We have cause for such rejoicing as revives and strengthens in us all the best traditions of our national history. A new day shines about us, in which our hearts take new courage and look forward with new hope to new and greater duties.

While we render thanks for these things, let us not forget to seek the Divine guidance in the performance of those duties, and Divine mercy and forgiveness for all errors of act or purpose, and pray that in all that we do we shall strengthen the ties of friendship and mutual respect upon which we must assist to build the new structure of peace and good-will among the nations.

Wherefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate Thursday, the twenty-eighth day of November next, as a day of thanksgiving and prayer, and invite the people throughout the land to cease upon that day from their ordinary occupations and in their several homes and places of worship to render thanks to God, the Ruler of nations.

WOODROW WILSON.

Issued at the White House, November 16, 1918.

President at Peace Conference

It was announced on November 18 that President Wilson would sail for France immediately after the opening of the regular session of Congress, to take part in the discussions of the main features of the treaty of peace. It was generally understood that the President would be absent from the country for about four weeks. He will be accompanied by the delegates chosen to represent the United States, by Mrs. Wilson, and a numerous staff. The President will not delegate his powers as Chief Executive while he is abroad.

situation in Germany was changing almost daily. By the 17th of November there were no rulers left in Germany of those who wielded the power a month ago, and the constitution of the German Imperial State constructed by Bismarck was reduced thereby to a scrap of paper. Sober second thought in the latter days of the week ending November 18 brought a reaction toward conservatism, and there were reports that the soldiers and sailors in various widely separated districts were taking the red bands from their arms and were once more flying the national flag, instead of the red flag of radical socialism, which approximates anarchy. A cabinet was being formed representative of the various liberal parties and demands were being voiced for the calling of a constituent assembly which should plan Germany's new government. But the Reds were still strong, especially in the navy, and the Bolshevik fire was spreading to Switzerland, where a general strike was threatened, and to Holland, where a strong movement was reported looking toward a demand for the abdication of Queen Wilhelmina. Even Belgium saw a memorial on the part of a certain element of the liberated Belgians who sought from the King modifications to the Belgian constitution. Sweden was also feeling the influence. The Swedish Government announced on November 14 that it had decided to carry out without delay a program of reforms giving the franchise to both sexes on equal terms and placing control of foreign policy as well as declarations of war and peace with the Riksdag. On November 18 a movement was reported in Luxemburg for the declaration of a republic and union with France.

WITH the armistice in process of administration the thought of the whole formerly belligerent world turned to the peace conference. Germany, through Dr. Solf, pleaded for speed in the gathering of the envoys, in order that famine and anarchy might be avoided. The Allies, while moving as rapidly as possible in their plans for relieving distress in Germany, showed no disposition to be hurried. It was expected, on November 17, that the conference would not meet until early in January.

Meanwhile the Versailles conference and the Allied statesmen, meeting in groups aside from the formal discussions at Versailles, were busy laying the groundwork of peace, preparing for the agreements between the Allied nations and the neutrals which will be the foundation on which the peace terms will rest. Not the least important matter to be decided will be the question of who shall be represented.

Considerable discussion was raised over a suggestion that President Wilson attend the peace conference. Inasmuch as he would outrank all the other envoys, it was suggested that he might be present only at the beginning of the discussions, or might go to France after matters began to shape themselves. Premier Clemenceau of France was reported on November 17 to have sent a message to the President indicating that the French Government would be gratified if he would attend the conference. Premier Lloyd George of England was earlier reported to have expressed a similar desire. Editorial opinion in this country rather tended to support the ancient tradition which limits the President, during his term, to the territorial boundaries of the United States. Colonel House, now in Paris, was considered a certain member of America's delegation. The names most prominently mentioned, other than his, were Justice Brandeis, former President Taft, Elihu Root, Senator Walsh of Montana, Secretaries Baker and Houston, former Justice Hughes and Senator Knox of Pennsylvania. America will hold a position of peculiar prestige at this council, standing as the arbiter of vexed questions and, since she has no interests of her own immediately at stake, being above the accusation that her decisions are influenced by her own selfish interests, she has both an unequalled opportunity to serve the cause of freedom and an unparalleled obligation to be just and impartial and above reproach.

Coblenz on the Rhine and the fortress of Ehrenbreitstein, where American troops will garrison the bridgehead Delegates of the German navy met Sir David Beatty on November 16, off Rosyth, Scotland, to arrange for the surrender of the ships provided for in the armistice.

November 21 saw the greatest naval surrender in history. The great German fleet of fighting ships left their bases on Nov. 18 and struck their flags at sea to the British, French and American fleets, being conducted to the harbors where they were to be interned pending the peace settlement.

The Week in the World's News

SLIGHT REDUCTION IN TAXES. The signing of the armistice and the conclusion of active fighting caused an immediate change in the financial outlook of the nation. Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo, in a letter to Senator Simmons, Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, on November 14, estimated the expenditures for the next fiscal year would be cut from $24,000,000,000 to $18,000,000,000. He urged, however, prompt enactment of the Revenue Bill, on which Congress was working, and recommended that it be planned to produce at least $6,000,000,000, a reduction of $250,000,000, and that war profit and excess profit taxes be continued as planned, but eliminated from the plans for the following fiscal year, reducing taxation for that year to about $4,000,000,000. According to Mr. McAdoo it will be necessary to continue loans to some of the Allies during the period of reconstruction.

BRITISH ELECTIONS, DECEMBER 14. It was announced in London, on November 14, that the British Government would issue a proclamation on the 25th, summoning a new Parliament, and that the present Parliament would be prorogued on the 20th. The proclamation would provide for the nominations to a new Parliament on December 4, voting to take place on December 14 and the ballots to be counted on December 28, providing a bill to that effect was passed by the present Parliament. The standing in the present House of Commons of the various parties is as follows: Liberals, 261; Unionists, 285; Nationalists, 76; Laborites, 39; Independent Nationalists, 8; Independent, 1. In the new Parliament there will be 707 seats, and the new members will be elected by a larger and wider suffrage, the election law of 1918 having added 2,000,000 men and 6,000,000 women to the 8,000,000 male voters previously qualified. The Lloyd George cabinet will appeal for support of the present coalition government representing all parties and no special interest. The Premier himself has stated his opposition to Home Rule, which coerces Ulster, and he has also given evidence that the coalition government is broadly conscious of the problems involving labor, land and wages, which come with reconstruction and the return home of the fighting men.

GERMAN WOMEN APPEAL FOR FOOD. The German wireless, on November 14, carried two appeals from the women and children of Germany asking for relief from the hunger now gripping their unhappy state. One appeal was addressed to Mrs. Woodrow Wilson; the other to Miss Jane Addams. The appeal to Mrs. Wilson declared that the women and children of Germany had been starving for years and that they would die from hunger unless the terms of the armistice were changed to provide rolling stock to remove food from the farms to the cities. The appeal to Miss Addams pictured the German women as foreseeing entire famishment and anarchy for their country unless food was speedily furnished. Dr. Solf, the new German Foreign Minister, also issued almost daily appeals to this country for relief of Germany's distress. Herbert Hoover sailed on November 16, charged by the President with the task of instituting far-reaching plans for the distribution of food which will banish famine from both our former Allies and our one-time enemies.

RECONSTRUCTING INDUSTRY. Immediately after the signing of the armistice with Germany, the various government bureaus and departments at Washington, in conference with President Wilson, took up the question of the return from war industries to peace industries of the thousands of employees and the men in the army. It was suggested that Bernard M. Baruch, Chairman of the War Industries Board, would head a commission which would be charged with scrapping the monster war machine and with getting the nation back on a peace basis with the least possible economic disorganization. The canceling of war contracts began on the signing of the armistice, and it was reported that the manufacturing of war materials would be slowed down as fast as the workers could find new occupations. Outside of the 4,000,000 men in the army there are said to be 3,000,000 to 5,000,000 war workers whose employment will either end or suffer modification with the demobilization of the army. The National Manufacturers' Association has announced that all of its members, and this includes the large being entertained. The former Empress was reported ill at Potsdam. The Crown Prince was finally located near the party, after having been variously reported killed, and still with his troops. In both France and England the suggestion was seriously advanced that the Kaiser be extradited and tried for his crimes, while in Berlin the Socialist government was also reported to be considering a trial for the Kaiser and of those of his advisers who were responsible for the beginning of the war.

TO REBUILD BELGIUM. It was announced in Washington, on November

LUTHERANS UNITE. In completion of the arrangements mentioned some months ago in the Christian Herald three leading Lutheran organizations of the country were united into one November 14. The General Council of the Lutheran Church, the General Synod of the Lutheran Church and the United Synod of the Lutheran Church in the South, represented by 511 delegates, ratified the plan of union in a convention in New York City creating thereby a new organization to be known as the Lutheran Church in America which will have 800,000 communicants with church property valued at $53,000,000, educational institutions to a value of $5,250,000, with 5,000 students and charitable institutions valued at $12,600,000.

SENDING THE BOYS HOME. General March, Chief of Staff, announced November 16, that 200,000 soldiers then in camps in the United States would be mustered out in the following two weeks and that discharges would continue at the rate of 30,000 a day thereafter. It was also announced that all convalescent, sick and wounded of the American Expeditionary Forces, who were able to travel, would be brought back without delay, and that plans for the general demobilization of the expeditionary forces were under consideration, exchanges being under way between General Pershing and the War Department. While vessels could be made available to bring over from 200,000 to 300,000 a month it was not stated that men would come back at that rate, but it was stated that those divisions which had been there longest, like the First Regulars and the Rainbow Division, which had seen hard and heavy work, would be the first to come home, probably being paraded and honored in the principal cities of the country before being mustered out. While the total had not been definitely determined it was announced on November 17, that the whole number of casualties—killed, wounded and missing—in the American Expeditionary Forces, would not exceed 100,000. On November 11 there were 2,200,000 American soldiers in Europe.

TIGHTENING THE STRINGS. The end of hostilities brought an immediate demand from members of Congress for both parties for radical changes in government expenditures, the feeling on both sides being that while niggardliness would have been a crime before the war, extravagance would be equally a crime with the war ended. Whereas Congress voted money lavishly before November 11, it was quite evident that it would carefully scrutinize expenditures thereafter, especially since much of the money must be raised by additional loans.

NATION SEIZES CABLES. Because of the delays in transmission of messages and failure to co-operate on the part of the two largest cable companies in the country it was necessary for the government, on November 18, under the authority granted by Congress, to take over and operate the Transatlantic cables.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The 10th International Labor Conference opened on November 13 at Laredo, Texas, with about 150 delegates from the United States, Mexico and Latin America. Samuel Gompers stirred both the delegates and the nation on November 16 by announcing that labor would not relinquish without a fight the advantages gained under war conditions. On November 15 Senator Pomerehne of Ohio introduced an amendment to the War Revenue Bill under consideration in the Senate Finance Committee whereby the products of child labor would pay a special excise tax of 10 per cent whenever they appeared in interstate commerce. . . . The Senate finally on November 18 adopted the Conference report on the Agricultural Stimulation Bill carrying the rate providing for National Prohibition at July 1, 1919.

PEACE ENDS RESTRICTIONS. With the coming of peace many of the restrictions under which Americans have been living will be either removed entirely or greatly modified. One of the first to be removed was the restriction on the use of wheat alone in the making of bread, which will soon be followed by the removal of restrictions on the use of sugar, the allowance of which has been increased to four pounds per month per person. The War Industries Board removed many of the restrictions on the nation's industries. Those that had been ordered to begin manufacturing at 100 per cent. war work were permitted to resume on a peace basis, this including the manufacture of passenger automobiles, and building operations were permitted to proceed, subject only to the requirements of the nation.

KAISER IN RETIREMENT. William Hohenzollern, now calling himself Count Hohenzollern, was reported, on November 12, to have reached Count Bentinck's castle at Middachten, near Velp, Holland, where he and his retinue were 11, that reconstruction work in Belgium was being planned on a large scale and that many thousand German prisoners would be put to work rebuilding canals, highways, railroads, factories and homes. This work had already been begun in the reoccupied parts of France, where the reconstruction work has followed the advance of the armies. It is planned to use the labor of German prisoners, in as far as possible, to make good the damage done by Germany in the country she overran.

WHAT GERMANY LOSES. The German territory between the former border and the Rhine, which is to be held by Allied troops as a guarantee of faithful performance by Germany of her part of the peace contract, is the richest and most prosperous portion of the German Empire, including Alsace-Lorraine. This region produces seventy-five per cent. of Germany's mining products, principally coal and iron, of which it produces of iron 21,000,000 of Germany's 28,000,000 tons. In addition to its value as a mining district this territory is a closely organized manufacturing district holding twenty-five per cent of the total manufacturing industries of the nation. In its 20,000 square miles before the war lived over 11,000,000 people.

He Lived for the Children

HOW would you like to be "father" to 500 at once? That is a real family of which even a patriarch might have been proud. It was such a family upon which our friend, Missionary Oberg lavished his life in the Hwangho valley in China. We tell the story next week.

Thousands of Japanese in California are working their way to education and leadership and many are finding Christ. Next week you'll know.

Next week, too, we will have some very important things to talk about which concern both next year and the holidays. Four pages of rotogravure packed tightly with mutual interest.

Next week, too, Requa Randall meets sorrow and Dick Ward is not found wanting, Marion Harland continues her discussion of Christmas problems, the Neighbors gather again and Miss Sangster skilfully covers life with a patch-work quilt.

The Thanksgivingest Day

By ANNIE
HAMILTON DONNELL

THE letter that came afterward was terrible. And it was so terrible to have it terrible! From Tim! Why, the days his letters came had always been the most wonderful of all the Brady family days! Days to celebrate, and they'd ways gone about the celebration as soon as the fortunate Brady that answered the postman's ring caught glimpse of the big, dear writing on the envelope.

"Letter from Timothy! Letter from Timothy!" how always rang joyously rough the house—always except this last time that was terrible. This time Mother d whispered it heartbroly—"Letter from Timothy." Why must it have en poor Mother who went the door? They would all ve so earnestly spared her. it then, it would have only t off the heartbreak, for she ould have read a little later at terrible, dear, dear let- . With its jokes—Tim's dy little jokes they'd al- ys laughed at with tears their eyes. The jokes were e hardest to read.

For the day before this, a patch had come from ashington saying that Tim- by Brady had been killed action. Those three dread ords.

"Of course 'in action,'" ther had said, his stricken e held high. The girls d that when he came out his and Mother's room ere they had gone together those first moments—that en Father came out he rched, as if to a splendid at of drums. And Mother, ming out too, marched side him—she even smiled. "If Mother only wouldn't ile!" sobbed the littlest dy girl who was only teen. "I can't bear it!" me things you could bear—you had to bear—but not at gallant little smile. Nel- ran away from it, up to r own room.

"Oh, Timmie, don't look wn!" she whispered. She ways had talked to Tim there, alone; he was her ol, next to Mother. "Don't k, Timmie; it would break ur heart even in heaven! other's smiling and Fath- s marching—both o' them rching."

AND they had had supper just the same. As though e telegram from Wash- gton had not come at all. other had made biscuit— st the same.

"Eat your three, remem- r!" had whispered Virginia- n to Nelly. "You've got eat your three!" and they d all, to a gallant Brady, ten their three. It was all ey could do for Mother. Just as today, when the ar terrible live letter had come from Tim, they all d sat in the same old eager row and listened to it d not flinched. It was Father who read it, clearing s throat after every little gay sentence but keeping ht on as if his voice now marched, to that inner ne of glory.

Such a time as they'd always made over whose rn it was to read this time; they kept very exact count and never allowed a "turn" to escape. The ole program and celebration had been like this:

"Letter from Timothy! Letter from Timothy! mebody telephone Grandmother and the Marrieds ick!"

"Tell 'em to come over early and bring their sew- gs. Tell 'em we'll have tea and little cakes—"

"Sugar cakes—to celebrate. Not a smitch o' mo- sses!"

"Somebody get Mother's glasses—this is Mother's rn. Up in her room—down in the kitchen—some- ere, quick!"

For they could not, of course, wait for Grandmother and the Marrieds. Not for the first quick reading. There were always separate readings. The Marrieds were Mrs. Grace and Mrs. Martha, who always came trolleying over, a baby apiece under their arms and a little Gracette a-trailing. Grandmother was only a matter of streets away. Very often there were little triangles of sandwiches and jam besides the tea and Celebration Cakes.

The dear stricken soul of her leaped at the beautiful words and broke into a joyous sobbing

"They're all down there, Timmie," Nelly would chatter as she hurried into her best dress, up in her room. "Grandmother's got her real lace on and the Martha-baby's wearing a new tooth for you! I don't believe there's a single other khaki 'Nunky' Over There has little white toothies eut to celebrate his letters home!"

The tea-cakes would be handed round with the cups of hot tea and presently they would drink their khaki boy's health in tea and the beautiful little ceremony would be over for another time. So many dear times! For Tim was a grand rememberer. That was what Nelly called it—rememberer. Catch old Tim forget- ting to write home!

THE letter that came—afterward was a little longer and a little jollier than all the rest. There were Timothy-jokes in it to read with their breaking hearts—more gay annals of life in the trenches.

"There's mud and MUD," wrote Timothy. "This is capital MUD! Soft-hearted, you know—wouldn't hurt a fellow for the world. Actually seems fond of a fellow! I believe I'm getting fond of MUD—chum- ming with it this way! 'Member, Mummy"—Tim- othy was the only one who said "Mummy"—"when I used to go barefoot and you'd make me scrub my feet before I got into bed nights? Just's well you don't see me go to bed now! But your little Timmie is so well, dear, he could hoist you up on one shoulder and Nell on the other and run you up Breakneck Hill on the double-quick! Wait till I do it, too, and shock all the neighbors and well-be- haved tabby-cats! Which brings me to your Tabby— tell her she ought to be over here catching our rats. Only I bet we'd miss 'em. There's one without a tail that we've adopted. You ought to see 'Mascot' in his gas mask that we rigged up for him! He's the tamest little rat!"

On and on, gaily—the dear live letter from the dear dead Tim.

Thanksgiving, coming so very soon, presented difficul- ties. For the Brady Thanks- givings were days to prepare for and to remember. As for skipping a Thanksgiving—

"But we'll have to this time, Father," Mother said whitely. "I'd do it if I ever could—"

"But you ever couldn't, dear heart. The children will all know—can you imagine the children not understand- ing?"

"No, oh, no—only it makes me feel I'd be so weak," sighed she. Mother weak! Splendid, smiling mother! "Besides, I've got everything nearly ready, Father. The mince pies are all made, you know. And the plum pud- ding—" Quite suddenly there Mother broke down and had it out on Father's shoul- der, for she thought of the little round plum pudding she had sent two weeks ago to Tim- othy across the sea. So full of plums, Nelly said, that there wasn't any room for the pudding. Mother had— kissed that little round brown ball and had never known that Nelly saw her doing it.

"I saw her, Timmie. Caught her in the act! If one spot in your Thanksgiv- ing pudding tastes sweeter than the rest of it, it'll be Mother's kiss. Anyway, I kissed the postage stamps!" Up in her own room this funny little Nell was always "running on" to Timmie. She had the queerest little crazy feeling that a wireless ran from her room to—to Timothy's MUD!

IT happened, then, quite without question or regret, that the Brady Thanksgiving was quietly dropped. No one gave it any more thought. There would be plenty of places where the pies would be acceptable acquisitions to other- wise scanty feasts. Two of them were slipped into Mrs. O'Mally's empty clothes-basket after she had taken out the piles of clean clothes. And Mrs. O'Mally, discovering them there, had burst into hearty tears.

"It's no Thanksgivin' they'll be havin', themselves, the darlin's!" she sobbed. "Wid the b'ye shtruck down in his innocent young youth! Oh, manny's the toime I've washed an' oironed him wid these hands an' scolded him wid this tongue for th' blackness of his little white suits! An' it's now I'd do him up if he scrubbin' broke me baek! 'Mis' O'Mally,' he'd say, wid the sorry little face av him, 'Mis' O'Mally, there's a lot o' grass-greens this week, I'm afraid'— An' him that swate an' polite, an' me scoldin' account o' th' grass-greens!"

For many years Mrs. O'Mally had done up the Bradys, and the little Timothy was hard to separate

The Nation Gives Praise

From the Psalms

GIVE unto the Lord, ye kindreds of the peoples,
Give unto the Lord the glory and strength; Give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name.

Tremble before him, all the earth!

Say among the nations, the Lord reigneth!

For he spake, and it was done;

He commanded, and it stood fast.

THE Lord bringeth the counsel of the nations to naught.

When the wicked spring as the grass,

And when all the workers of iniquity do flourish;

It is that they shall be destroyed forever.

For, lo, thine enemies shall perish!

The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice!

RIGHTEOUSNESS and judgment are the foundation of his throne,

And all the peoples have seen his glory.

He shall judge the peoples with equity;

He shall judge the world with righteousness.

He will speak peace unto his people and to his saints;

But let them not turn again to folly.

Surely his salvation is nigh them that fear him—

That glory may dwell in the land.

MERCY and truth are met together;

Righteousness and peace have kissed each other.

He maketh peace in thy borders.

He feedeth thee with the finest of the wheat.

He hath not dealt so with any nation.

Praise ye the Lord!

The Great Peace Thanksgiving

THANKSGIVING once more arrives, and we as a people have much that is especial to be thankful for. Each individual reader of the Christian Herald will find that he can make a very long list of his blessings and that after he has made it there will still be uncounted blessings flowing from this transitory but fruitful life.

Nationally the Republic, our beloved country, is richly laden with favors received. First of all our blessings, we are, after the awful war, at peace with all nations. It is our glory that we ended that war and led to this peace. The Father seems to have especially used our nation as his mighty instrument in ending the world carnage, discord, oppression and injustice, and to have stood up our President as the inspired champion and guardian of the worldwide rights of man. The conviction of righteousness is better cause for thanksgiving even than victory itself.

Our increased world responsibilities are to be counted not as a burden but as a wondrous blessing, not to ourselves alone but to all mankind. In emerging from our traditional policy of isolation to proclaim and enforce freedom for all the downtrodden peoples, we have taken our place as a powerful international factor, but have formed no entangling alliances. Standing at the very center of world control, we are friend of all nations.

All classes of our people are enjoying unprecedented prosperity, and, while there must be vast readjustments, this prosperity will not be diminished, but will be increased by the industries and trades of peace. It will be our richer blessing to share our plenty among the starving, naked, shelterless and impoverished of the war-shattered countries of the world. No diviner blessing could any people have than great strength consecrated to the help of the common brotherhood.

No people on the earth today have such cause for deep and grateful thanksgiving, individually and nationally, as we fortunate citizens of the Mother Republic, greatest as she is the most bountifully blessed of all nations—greatest of all in the highest sense, because she is of greatest service to all.

Building on the Rock

THERE are several versions of the story, but the original is one related by Miss Sara Wray of the Eighth Avenue Mission of New York.
It was in the early days of Salvation Army work in the slums of Spitalfields, London, England.

A young girl had been rescued from a life of infamy and shame, and had been taken back to mother and home in a country village in the south of England.
Although her soul was gloriously redeemed, her poor body was ravaged and wasted, and her last moments on earth had arrived. The kindly doctor, keeping his finger on her fluttering pulse, turned to the mother and whispered, "She's sinking." The quick ear of the girl caught the words, and immediately gathering up her remaining strength, and with a smile of ineffable sweetness upon her face, she said, "No, doctor, I'm dying, but I'm not sinking.
I cannot sink. I'm on the Rock."

The cataclysm in Europe has caused some timorous hearts to fear that civilization was in danger of sinking. Not so the Christian believer. "Every one therefore which heareth these words of mine and doeth them, shall be likened unto a wise man, which built his house upon the rock." Of a truth, during the past four years the rains have fallen, and the floods have come, and the winds have blown, and they have beaten upon the house. "But it fell not."
The foundation upon which the edifice of Christian truth is built is eternally immovable. Some of the superstructure has suffered damage; but the foundation is unhurt.

And now that the war is over and the duty of rebuilding confronts us, let us be sure we are on the right foundation. Let us continue to build upon the Rock.

When Our Heroes Come Home

NOW that the war is over and the work of establishing enduring world-peace is about to begin, we may soon expect to hear of our brave boys coming home. It may be weeks or even months before the returning tide sets in, but its coming is sure. During the long struggle just ended, our heroes have faced the great realities of life and death so frequently that their attention has been fixed upon the essentials of religion, while minor distinctions, divisions and differences during those months have sunk to the level of unimportance.
And now they are looking forward to coming back home again. What will they find here on their return? Will they discover that while the whole world has entered upon a grander era, which opens up to the race of men not only a wider field of glorious possibilities, but a clearer view of God's beneficent purposes, the old familiar conditions in the Church still prevail, and that the old-time controversies and little rivalries combine to obscure the light of truth and to perpetuate division? We are glad to believe that when they return they will discover rather that the same spirit which wrought a transformation in the trenches has been at work in the churches, and that those at home have had such a revelation of the eternal verities that they can never again go back to the old attitude and misunderstandings of pre-war days. One of the results of the world conflict is that it has clarified the religious atmosphere and given us glimpses of the things that are essential.

Herein lies the problem which the Church is now facing, and we rejoice to see that in many quarters it is being met in the right spirit. In recent months the Christian Herald has taken the lead in voicing the popular demand for such a simplification of the religious life of the Christian people of America as will enable them to come into closer fellowship, and will make them cooperative workers instead of rivals as in the past. Leading ministers in almost all of the denominations have united in urging, not the abolition of denominationalism, but the broadening of denominational lines for the purpose of cooperative Christian effort in the widest sense.
It is a movement which is demanded by the new conditions of the time, and it is constantly gaining in power and influence. If the nations of the world can unite on material lines for the purpose of assuring satisfactory international relations and future peace and happiness, surely the forces of the Church can afford to do the same on spiritual lines for the purpose of winning the world to Christ.

Already some of our religious bodies are moving in the direction of denominational unity, not through fear of their own waning faith, but to broaden the field of service of their following and all with whom they may come in contact in the Lord's work. Presbyterians, Methodists, Congregationalists, Baptists and others have, through their leading spokesmen, come out strongly in favor of the spiritual unity of all the denominations. Dr. James L. Barton of the American Board puts the matter in a nutshell in these words: "The vital question is, Are we justified in perpetuating a custom that is manifestly divisive often destructively competitive, and for which there is no warrant in Scriptures?" This from the head of the oldest American Protestant missionary organization is significant as showing the present trend of sentiment among the spiritual leaders. Across the line, in Canada, our neighbors are moving toward Church unity, not involving surrender of organization, but on lines of free and voluntary cooperation. So it will be ultimately in all the churches.

Our Trade After the War

THE foreign trade of the United States in the year which ends with next month, the calendar year 1918, seems likely to make another "high record." A compilation estimating the trade of the full year based upon the figures thus far available puts the total imports at approximately $3,1-000,000, and the total exports at approxima-ly $6,200,000,000, thus estimating the year's total trade at approximately $9,300,000,000, against $9,185,000,000 in 1917, the former high-record year.
The excess of exports over imports will approximate $3,000,000,000, and the aggregate excess of exports over imports for the four and one half years of war will exceed $11,000,000,000, or more than that of the forty years preceding the war.

This war-time increase in foreign trade, huge as it is, is likely to prove only a prelude to the greater and continuing increase to come with settled peace.

The newly constructed and rapidly increasing merchant marine must not only bring the men from France but carry to France and Belgium, devastated by the war, to lands of southern Europe long unproductive through lack of man-power, and even to the enemy nations, foodstuffs, clothing and other means of keeping alive the war-weakened populations.
The American people, from their plenty, will be called upon to feed Europe.

Industrially the change from war to peace will create as many problems as did the change from peace to war. War contract plants must be converted to make the commodities of peace. Workers engaged in such plants must be assimilated in peace production. Wage standards, changed by the war, must be readjusted. The position of women in industry must be determined. The returned soldier must have work and a home.

With the war behind and peace ahead we must no wise discount the tasks and opportunities of the future. The great problems of war will be succeeded by the important questions of peace and reconstruction.

The Bowery Mission in War Time

THE Bowery Mission has during the war taken on a new and most significant aspect. For many years it has been the center of appeal need, the refuge of homeless and impoverished indians.

The clamorous demand for workmen created by the war, however, has put an end to a large measure of this destitution, and employers of labor, including the Federal Government itself, have speedily acquired the habit of coming to the Bowery for their supply of skilled and unskilled men. The consequence is that the famous street is now experiencing one of the busiest periods in its picturesque history, and there more men coming and going than ever before.

What an extraordinarily fruitful field for the missionary effort is thus afforded, our readers will easily realize. The workers of the Bowery Mission also realize the fact to the fullest degree, and are busily engaged night and day ministering to the crowds of men thus providentially brought to contact with them.

Religious meetings are held every evening, and the weekly patriotic rallies are largely attended.
The famous old institution has probably never had better work than during the past twelve months.
Then, too, the relief work of the Mission, so well known and widely appreciated in the past, is still active, for there are many men old, or infirm, or in other ways incapacitated for work, who rebel against being sent to the workhouse, who must be cared for.

The readers of the Christian Herald have long known the mainstay of this work. It did not need the experience of war relief work to convince them of the blessedness of giving. They have had this for many years. We are therefore confident that at this Thanksgiving time they will not forget the needs of the Bowery Mission, and that, as a thank-offering for the glorious blessing of peace restored, they will send in their contributions with an greater liberality than before.

The Church After the War

Still Further Views from Religious Leaders and Others on the Need of World-wide Cooperation in Spiritual Effort

THE great war is already receding into the distance. The cessation of hostilities through an armistice has brought more strikingly to the front the post-war question put by the Christian Herald, which is now being so widely discussed, viz.: "What Should the Churches of Protestant America Do to Meet the Religious Situation after the War?" With intensified urgency, all the hints that the writers have made during the discussion now come to the forefront. The question is no longer one of the future; it is a question which belongs to the present day and hour. The opportunity of a Church has arrived!

We give below another instalment of communications received in response to our invitation for an expression of views of this overshadowing subject. There are many more to follow. We anticipate, however, that, the war having ended, the immediacy of the Church's opportunity will be so generally felt at many more than heretofore will be attracted to the discussion, which will doubtless be productive of much good. The Christian Herald's columns are an open forum for a free exchange of views on this subject.

The War Is Giving Us Clearer Spiritual Vision, Which of Itself Should Unite Us, writes Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, Famous English Divine

THE question asked were, "What should the Protestant churches of the world do to meet the situation?" I should feel more competent to answer and really I take it that it comes to the same thing. Then I have no hesitation in saying that I am completely in agreement with the view expressed in your letter. Hair-splitting differences and denominational distinctions must cease. My own conviction is that these will cease, not by any man abandoning conviction, doctrinal or ecclesiastical, but by all recognizing, not merely the sincerity of others, but at while grace is one, its means are many. In this case surely, above all others, God fulfils himself in any ways in the experience of men.

It seems to me that this war is giving us clearer sight in two directions: we have seen the devil more clearly than we have during our lifetime; and the finite glory of the divine ideal is seen with vivid distinctness, in contrast to the breakdown of all human schemes. Surely this double vision should be efficient in itself to unite us in our warfare against one, and our uttermost devotion to the realization of the other.

The War Will Bind the Nations Together, and the Church Must Not Lose Her Opportunity, writes W. B. Millar, General Secretary Laymen's Missionary Movement

YOUR question emphasizes the truth that a new day is dawning. It is a time to get together; the only problem is how and to what extent. Protestantism is not ready for a "Pope," no matter how strong a leader he may be. The denominations are not altogether ready to drop their distinctive differences and to unite in one great Church; but we can unite in great tasks, in the doing of which ecclesiastical differences will disappear. The greatest of these tasks is the one great work of the Church—the saving of the world to Christ. There are innumerable things in the homeland that can be done by a united effort, and the evangelization of the non-Christian world cannot be accomplished in any other way so quickly and so effectively.

We see the earnest of this new day in the union efforts already undertaken in non-Christian lands. It is too much to ask that the entire missionary task be a union effort on a vast scale, thus eliminating waste, friction and overlapping?

This war is going to bind the nations of the world together in a new understanding and appreciation. May the Church not miss her great opportunity in this crucial hour.

Blending of Organizations, but a Restatement of Fundamentals of Christianity, writes Bishop W. R. Weekley, United Brethren

In my judgment, there will be no blending of Protestant churches after the war into one great ecclesiastical organization. Nothing that I can see points that direction. Nor will there be any changing of methods to meet post-war conditions. But there will be a re-emphasis of the old fundamentals, such as the inspiration of the Scriptures, the deity of Jesus Christ, and the great fact of personal salvation from sin. The soldiers returning home will not expect to find new churches with new creeds and new administrative policies; but they will need to be welcomed by their old churches, full of social warmth and spiritual life. The fact is, their conceptions of the need of prayer, their confidence in the Word and their ideals of a true Christian life, which they carried into the army, were all gotten from the churches at home, and when they get back they will appreciate those churches as never before. When home again, they will want and need nothing more than the old Galilean Gospel, proclaimed in the power of the Spirit.

That there should be, and will be, a closer federation and heartier co-operation among the Protestant forces of the country, there can be no doubt. While the crown of German imperialism will have been cast into the dust forever, there will be another form of autocracy to deal with that will require an unbroken front in our Protestant ranks.

Sectarian Divisions and the Spirit of Worldliness Must Be Overcome, says an Idaho Pastor

YOUR editorial, "Can You Help to Solve It?" in the issue of the 31st of October has impressed me to add a few words to the great theme you so heartily recommended for consideration. We have heard through the Christian Herald the reveille from the Religious Congress at Pittsburg. The failure of the Church at this critical period of the world's history must be and is in reality a heartrending experience to every loyal, right-thinking Christian. In a time when systems of culture and government are thrown to the winds in confession of utter failure, what of the Church of Christ? How sad is the fact that not even a counseling voice or protest has been recorded from organized Christianity in the present world cataclysm! Even the reverse has happened, and, contrary to the principles of her Founder, the Church, on the side of the governments of the world, is today at war with Christian nations, people of the same race, brothers of one faith, and members of the body of Jesus Christ. Even the heathen must be hiding their faces from such a sight. What then of Christ and the saints in glory?

Confession to God is the first step, if we would be set right. We must acknowledge our neglect and "know from whence we are fallen, and repent." One of the great hindrances in the accomplishment of Christ ideals in our international relationship is the division of the Church. Her power as a leading factor is wearing down through sectarian strifes and divisions. This will have to be overcome and set right if the Church is ever to regain her lost ground.

Another of her great hindrances is the spirit of worldliness, or lack of holiness. In accord with customs and desires prevailing among men, many, yea, too many, of her members are lusting for worldly power and glory. Mammon is the great stumbling-block that is causing the Church's greatest failures. Contrary to Christ's positive declaration, she is practicing the impossible, namely, "to serve two masters." God in Jesus Christ will have to be her Master and his will and precept the supreme authority of faith and action. She will have to abolish forever the world's dominating falsehood of the double standard of morality, one for the individual and another for the state, and, like the heroes of old, she may again have to seal her fidelity to Christianity with the blood of her saints.

Then, with clear voice and clean hands, she can preach and minister the Gospel of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, the essence of Christianity, the only remedy for perishing humanity.

Some Churches Are Already Getting into Line for a Post-War Unity Program, writes Frank L. Brown, World's S. S. Association

THE churches should meet our returning boys with an increased program of unity. Where several small churches of different denominations in the same neighborhood, in city or country, are struggling along with pastors of indifferent quality, with poor choirs and with small attendance, they should unite, no matter at what cost of personal feeling, select a good preacher, get the best musical leadership possible and fit out their plant so that they shall have a program for every evening of the week.

A church in the average community has no excuse for keeping closed between Sundays in view of the investment in that plant, the freedom from taxes allowed by the community and the community needs. If a church cannot discover a reason why it should be kept open, the community will answer that question if they are fairly interrogated.

In two churches in New York State there has been such a combination as is here referred to. In one place where there were four churches, three are now used for other purposes—one for a Grange hall, another for an Odd Fellows' Temple—and all the church membership has united in the Presbyterian Church and the choirs brought together under one leadership, with a large gain in the influence of the church in that community. In another place where there were two churches, they decided upon having one Sunday school for the community and one preaching service.

In a new community in Denver, Colo., all of the residents of different denominations united in one enterprise which, through the decision of the members, was placed under a denomination, and the pledge to which they subscribed upon entering that church, while it held to all the fundamentals, was yet sufficiently broad to bring within the membership of that church these several denominations. The missionary offerings are distributed to the denominations to which the members belonged, according to their numerical representation. This church has a wonderful weekday institutional program which cares splendidly for the young men and young women and the boys and girls of the community.

In all our churches there should be arranged a definite program of service for the returning boys. This should have to do not simply with social and recreational opportunities for the young, but it should aim particularly at using them in lines of Sunday school, church and community leadership. In other words, the jobs should be those that are worth while. Among the suggested lines of service might be mentioned church publicity specialist, recreational leader for Sunday school and community groups, teachers of big boys, social service survey and social service activities, representation upon inter-church committees having to do with patriotic demonstrations, community amusements, community recreations, community religious work.

There should be started, in every church, plans for a leadership training class where these young men shall be trained to specific forms of leadership, the same as in the army, camps are provided for special training of quartermasters, tank and aviation specialists.

Two Great Things Christianity Needs: To Get Back to the Simple Teachings of Christ, and Unity

I HAVE been reading with interest your editorials and letters published on "The Church after the War." It is a good thing to see this awakening, for all of us realize today that something has been lacking, not only with the Church but with all Christians, for this world war would never have swept us off our feet had we been built on the solid rock of Christ.

It seems to me that the two great things Christianity needs are: first, to get back to the simple teachings of Christ, and, second, to seek unity.

How simple was the message of Christ summed up in those few words, "To love God with all our heart, soul and mind, and to love our neighbor as ourselves." How beautiful was his Sermon on the Mount, yet how we have forgotten it all! We have advanced so fast and far in material progress that the simple and more essential progress of soul has been put aside. We seem to have reversed that saying of Christ's, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, yet lose his own soul?" It used to be the custom to bring up children by the teaching of the Bible, to have them understand love and kindness, to seek the simple things of the soul instead of worldly gain and vanities. How all this has changed! You can see it all around you. It seems the very air breathes different; as some one has said, "It seems selfishness has gripped the heart of the world."

I think, too, if Christians would all combine they would have greater strength. God doesn't care if we are Methodists, Lutherans or anything else; but he does care how we apply his teachings to ourselves.

The God of love doesn't care what Church we belong to, or what country, or what color we are. "He is no respecter of persons," but loves all.

Let us get back to the simple but real things of religion, and be not only hearers of the Word, but doers.

Show Your Colors

TEXT—Rev. 1:16. "And he had in his right hand seven stars."

A DECADE or so ago there was a theme very much in favor throughout the length and breadth of the land, "If Christ should come to Chicago; if Christ should come to New York." I fancy that hardly a city, town or hamlet failed of receiving its call from the hypothetical Visitor. The topic was admirably adapted for giving vigorous expression to the passion and purpose of an hour of political and moral reform.

In some measure the present message is an echo of those stirring days. Only in this instance we shall endeavor to visualize the consequences if Christ should visit his Church. Fortunately I am able to venture a pretty safe guess as to what would happen, for we have reliable records upon which to base our deductions. In the first century, as Revelation relates, Christ made a tour of inspection among the churches bearing his name. The purpose was to arouse the members to a full realization of their responsibility to him and to the world. That these visitations were intended as an admonition to all churches and for all time to come is manifest. In every instance the pastor was specifically enjoined to write a verbatim report and send it to the churches. A study of these records reveals characteristics and shortcomings of which the church in every age has been painfully aware.

THE revelation of Jesus Christ was august and inspiring. We are told with some detail and in words that stagger the imagination how he came and stood amidst the candlesticks. He was clad in a garment reaching to the feet, the ermine of divine prerogative. His hair was white as the driven snow, token of inapproachable holiness. His eyes were a flame of fire, penetrating all make-believe and cant. His voice was as the voice of many waters, the voice of cadence or dreadfulness according as those addressed were spiritually sensitive or hardened. Out of his mouth went a two-edged sword, meting out unescapable judgment. His countenance was as the sun shining in its splendor. Magnificent is the Christ portrayed in this inspired cameo!

What Christian hath not at one time or another known John's misgivings! But look you! The high light is now to be added to the picture, for, with reassuring "Fear not," Christ opened his right hand, and there in the palm lay seven shimmering stars. As the trembling apostle, in wonder and awe, gazed upon the spectacle he was assured that failure in any Christian undertaking is impossible to one whose life is held in the strong grasp of His mighty hand. The faithful soldier of the Cross is a star in the Saviour's right hand. Such was the revelation when Christ visited the churches of Asia.

We have neither mind nor calculus wherewith to fathom the profound import of this vision and describe the orbit of a God-gripped soul. Nevertheless we perceive, in some measure at least, the privilege of discipleship and our own responsibility to the Master and to the world. Then fix the mind upon the Saviour's hand as a holy secret is disclosed. In the text we behold Christ's service flag. Observe how it is worn. Not at the throat, where emotions ebb and flow; not upon the breast where passions surge, but in the right hand—the hand of dexterity—the hand with which He works.

A LEAP across the intervening centuries, and John's vision obtains body in a very recent revelation of Jesus Christ to a church on the Pacific slope. Several weeks ago the path of duty brought one of my elders to the city of Spokane. A beautiful Sabbath morning found him worshipping in the First Presbyterian Church. In this church two service flags are displayed. At the close of the service the significance of the second flag was explained to him. Greatly troubled on account of the slowing down of spiritual activities due to war conditions, the pastor conceived an idea little short of an inspiration. The following Sabbath Dr. Sherman Divine went before his people with a message that evoked immediate response. After laying before them the actual state of affairs, and having made them realize that the strength of the fighting front abroad depends in a very real sense upon the strength of the skyfront at home, he pointed to their star-spangled service flag and challenged his hearers, from among the unchurched, to put a star in Christ's flag for every star in the service flag.

I am told that the results were far beyond those anticipated. The effect was both psychological and spiritual. Envoicing churches, hearing of the success of this appeal to a deeper patriotism, unfurled the new standard with equally gratifying results. In several instances a quiet work of grace has been going on ever since the new standard was set up.

DEEMING the idea of more than local value, I ventured to speculate upon the probable consequences if it were generally exploited. My mind conjured up a chain of conceivable possibilities. What if this venture in idealism should prove the vanguard of a new Crusade? The thought was inspiring. Surely popular reaction would be sympathetic since man is by nature responsive to symbols expressive of emotions too deep for words. Probably the Church is waiting for some common standard, embodying the spirit of the New Era, about which all may rally. Possibly there is a connection between the service flag and the seven-starred hand. Of late there have been moments of spiritual illumination when in America, in England, and amidst the ruined sanctuaries of France men have had glimpses of a glorious Form moving about among the candlesticks. Has He inspired this idea?

In view of these and other considerations the time seems ripe for a New Crusade—a forward movement of all spiritual forces and on a grand scale. But the standard for such a movement should be distinctly churchly, rather than an adaptation. It should be broadly conceived, expressive of the most generous spirit and executed by some one who has the confidence and affection of the general public.

OBVIOUSLY there is but one logical person for such a task. So a letter went forward to Captain R. L. Queisser, the originator of the national service flag, setting forth the idea and requesting him to design a church flag. After mature thought he too had a vision, of which he wrote: "The flag or banner should consist of a white field edged about with gold or yellow fringe. In the center of the field should be placed the red Passion Cross, emblematic of the church and the insignia of the Knights Templar in their crusades. Then the stars may be added from time to time, in groups or circles, or in design such as might befit the occasion or requirements. At our own church we have Old Glory on the right of the pulpit facing the audience and the Service Flag on the left side. The Church Service Flag or banner could well be hung directly behind the pulpit, thus making an incomparable trinity of flags."

A more appropriate design could scarcely be conceived. The white field, emblematic of righteousness and peace; the gold fringe, token of the Kingdom and its King; the Cross, symbolizing the Great Price which He paid; the blue stars, badge of the fidelity and the devotion which should characterize each soldier. There is nothing left to be desired. The scope, the program and the spirit of Christianity all are embodied in this standard.

AT THIS point let it be remembered that the Book of the Revelation occupies the same unique position in the New Testament as the books of prophecy occupy in the Old Testament. In both we have the foreshadowing of actual history, an outline of a long chain of events leading up to the Great Consummation and the universal rule of Christ. And concerning the Revelation an additional observation may be made, namely, a distinct promise of blessing is made to those who read and hear "the words of the prophecy of this book." Now, I covet this blessing for myself, for my people, for my country and for the age.

It is not unlikely that the promised blessing will come largely through the readiness with which we read the signs of the times. Indeed, the Revelation was specially designed to qualify us so to read. Amidst the spiritual glory of the present hour, very many obscure passages like the one before us have taken on new significance. As the embattled stars of Daniel's state document (Dan. 12:3) foreshadow a national service flag, so, I take it, this hand full of stars in John's church document foreshadows a church service flag. Moreover, an even more striking parallel would seem to support this interpretation of Scripture. Else why would seven stars be chosen as the insignia of the Allied generalissimo's high office? In the latest photographs of Marshal Foch seven stars appear upon each sleeve. In the best picture we have of the living Christ seven stars appear in His right hand. "Things that are equal to the same thing are equal to each other," mathematicians tell us. Why should not the same rule apply in spiritual matters?

So I am prepared to believe that we shall be reflecting the Infinite Mind if we lift up this new standard and, pointing to the stars of blue, call to the thought of the world to the privileges of discipleship. Without doubt spiritual refreshings will follow. There will come a feeling of new elevation, new responsibility, new energizing. We shall hold fellows with such noble spirits as John and Peter and Paul. The daily task will be glorified. Through the chaos of dark happenings and darker forebodings we shall hear the soft footfall of oncoming days of shine and service. Neither will we be dazzled by the splendor of the former nor staggered by the responsibilities of the latter, for the gentle assurance of His "fear not" will come floating to us across the centuries as we eyes upon the stars in His hand we sing,

That hand which bears all nature up
Will guard His people well.

Forward then, O church militant! Rally the moralized and scattered forces of the King! Relieve the dimming stars, recover the fallen stars! Mobilize the vision, the faith, and the prayer of this generation in a new crusade!

Place your star in His flag! I challenge the reticent Christian, the man who was once a church officer or Sabbath school superintendent; the woman who was a teacher or active worker. I challenge the reserved Christian, the unattached person, the buttoned sermon-taster. I challenge the drifting Christian who is of one denomination today, another tomorrow, a third next day, and then nothing at all. I challenge the backslidden Christian who has wandered so far into the enemy's country that the memory of mother's prayer has been effaced. I challenge the secret Christian who cherishes a very real love for the Saviour and supports His cause but who has never dared make the great adventure. I challenge the sinners whom the Saviour came all the way to Calvary to enlist.

HOW many, many "wandering stars" (Jude 1:24) there are which the church might recover under the spell and the impetus of a new crusade! A former pastor of the church to which I minister conducted house-to-house visitation, and on a single residential street of five blocks were found a greater number of Christians than could be accommodated in our large auditorium. It is no exaggeration to say that there is hardly a city or town where the same situation might not be unearthed. The draft extends the government's strong hand into every home, into every nook and corner of the nation, and behold a galaxy of glowing stars! The right hand of Christ hath equally compelling power, albeit of a different nature. The very wording of the Scripture signifies as much. "Holdeth" the seven stars (Rev. 2:1) implies literally a tight and powerful grip. If we feast His hand, make known the prophetic purport of the seven stars, and call for recruits, I am persuaded that hearts will eagerly respond.

I have been thinking of those sublime words spoken to backslidden Israel, "Behold, I have graven thee on my hands, thou art mine." And "graven" is a wonderful word; literally it is "tattooed." Think of God affixed the chosen race to his hand in such a manner that he can neither erase them nor forget his gracious purpose. Even so, fellow Christians, I and I are graven on Christ's hands. Let this glorious consciousness flood the soul, that while the Master calls all to the colors we may be enabled to meet the high resolve, "Having borne His name I will henceforth honor it."

A DRAMATIC scene was witnessed some years ago by a company of travelers. As a crowd train was drawing out of the New York station and swung aboard the last car. He was a man of personality. In search for a seat he made his way from car to car finding none until he reached the smoker. He settled himself for the journey and opened a book to read. But he could not, for immediately behind him were two degenerates by whom he was greatly disturbed. It was not the smoke that distressed him. They were exchanging filthy anecdotes, and indulging in the most obscene and profane language. Finding it impossible to think or read himself out of his environment he arose, stepped into the aisle, and in a voice deep, resonant and vibrant with emotional force easily heard the full length of the car, he addressed the passengers: "Gentlemen, these are days when every man ought to show his colors. I have been sitting here for a full half hour listening to words not fit for decent ears. More than that, the name of my very best Friend has been bantered about in such a manner that I can no longer remain silent. The best Friend I have ever had is the Lord Jesus Christ."

Resting the Soul

SUNDAY, December 1. Ps. 116:7. "Return unto thy rest, O my soul." Ps. 42:5. "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? Hope thou in God." This counsel is very different to our ordinary practice in the common things of life. It is our ordinary custom to seek rest by dropping the bigger thing and taking up a smaller thing. We lay aside the book which severely taxes all the powers of our mind, and we turn for rest to a light novel or some loitering book of travel, or to a leisurely company of essays where the spirit is genial and where everything moves in quiet air and happy laughter. We rest ourselves in smaller fields. But the high counsel of the psalmist takes us on quite another road. When the soul is tired and restless and disquieted he leads up from the smaller things to the greatest thing, even into the wonderful presence of God. The tired eyes of the soul are to be rested in vivid vision. The anxious mind is to be soothed in deeper contemplations. The soul, which is burdened because of the greatness of its way, is to be lightened by being led into a greater way, even in the highway of our God. We are to find a vital rest in larger communion. "Oh, rest in the Lord!"

We may assuredly expect to find rest in the Lord because the Lord is the only home of the soul. When we turn to the Lord it is going home. "Lord, thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations." Sometimes we send our tired, ailing folk to the locality where they were born, and where they spent their early days. We say that it will do them good to breathe their native air. They are like plants that have got away from their native zone and have become stunted in the uncongenial air, and they are taken back to their appropriate climate. And our God is the native climate of the soul. When we are away from him, we are vagrants in uncongenial country. In him we live and move and have our being. And when we breathe the heavenly air of his presence, the soul enjoys the restfulness of its own home. And if the soul has a rest in the Lord all the powers of our being will respond to the quickening touch of our native air. That is surely the interpretation of the sacred fellowship of the Holy Ghost. When we arrive in that hallowed atmosphere the fruits of the Spirit begin to appear, and these fruits are just our spiritual powers which have been released and refined and made robust and gracious by the nourishing ministries of the divine race. Sleeping things awake. Withered things come to life. Arrested things reach out to new strength and beauty. The soul has found its rest, and in finding its rest it has discovered its inheritance. It finds its rest, and it then goes to school in the amazing ministry of the love and wisdom of God. "Come unto me and I will give you rest." "Learn of me and ye shall find rest." J. H. J.

The Parched Ground and the Pool

MONDAY, December 2. Isa. 35:7. "And the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water." Life has its fruitful years and its barren years. The paths we tread between the cradle and the grave are not all pleasant. Soon or late we come to the parched ground. There is no use to deceive ourselves by thinking that all life may be as merry as a May-day. Our lives are much like the changing seasons of a year. Sunshine and cloud, calm and storm, heat and cold, beauty and barrenness, are mingled in our portion. There is no question about this. The only question is, What shall we do when the bleak days come? How shall we travel over the desert places? Is there a philosophy of life which is capable of transfiguring the desert place, capable of making the parched ground grateful and refreshing? The man who wrote these words believed he had such a philosophy. He lived in strenuous times and yet enjoyed great inner peace.

The Christian religion does in fact transfigure the barren places in our lives. We get strength out of our bitterest struggles, and the Lord Christ gives us beauty for ashes. Think of the Master. He lived in all times, among a commonplace people. Did he ever sink, "If I were in Rome, a Roman soldier or captain or senator; or if I were a Greek, in the days when Greece was making history, I might make a noble name of myself"? Nay, he never said such a thing, or even thought it. The carpenter shop was his throne. The lowly village was his capital. The little province was his world, but his kingdom was great, for his kingdom was within. The events of his daily life were the material with which he built a stately mansion for his soul—made for ours. The hunger and thirst of the common people around him were his chance to prove his strength and tenderness. He was like that violinist when all his violin strings but one had snapped and broken; he played on, and played superbly—"Paganini and one string!"

Life is what we choose to make it by God's help. A king with the mind of a slave is poor and pitiable. A slave with the mind of a king is royal, whatever his lot. For him the parched ground becomes a pool.

The First Gospel

TUESDAY, December 3. Gen. 3:15. "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." These words of the righteous God who is passing sentence on the first trespassers against his holy law have been called the First Gospel. Rightly so; for in these words God takes the part of the sinners whom he has had to condemn. He throws down the gauntlet to the old bitter foe, the arch-enemy of God and man. With this declaration of war against the power of evil God began the struggle for the redemption of the souls of sinners which Satan had tried to wrest from him. Then commenced that long-drawn-out struggle which terminated on Calvary when the bruised Redeemer, the promised Woman's Seed, crushed the serpent's head, and through the gloom of that sunless afternoon there rang the victorious shout of the Prince of life, the Captain of our salvation: "It is finished!" The war is over; the victor sits enthroned in his kingdom of glory; the spoils of his warfare are by the preaching of his Gospel distributed to men. Millions of glad and loyal subjects of Christ are by faith in him paying homage to their crowned chief, and the foe lies prostrate, awaiting his final doom at the coming of the Lord. He is still permitted for a season to go about like a hungry beast roaring after prey, but he has been shown to all who will see to be degraded and powerless. He must flee apace at the name of Jesus. Even Christ's seed, his believing followers, are vanquishing Satan and his brood again and again; they resist his temptations, spurn his accusations, and thwart his wicked designs. They show to their benighted fellow men that they are serving a dethroned monarch, and make deluded hirelings of themselves, if they still continue in the thrall of the errors and lies which he has disseminated in the world. To do all this is the Christian's privilege; however, it is also his duty. He must prove his valor against the powers that oppose his salvation, and fight for the deliverance of many who still are held captive by him.

Knowing Christ

WEDNESDAY, December 4. Luke 24:16. "Their eyes were holden." Jesus' promise, "Lo, I am with you always," is fulfilled in the life of every believer. But we do not always realize his divine presence. He often walks with us and we know him not for the moment till some new glory flashes upon the soul, when we cry out, "My Lord and my God!" His visit was unexpected at that hour. It was during Paul's slumber that he heard the Macedonian call. It was on his way to Damascus that he heard, "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest." Our Lord often reveals himself and his great truths suddenly. A luminous flash of holy light fills the soul as we see him transfigured or crucified, risen or ascending, or when we are filled with the Holy Spirit's power.

These special illuminations are separate and distinct from the gradual shining, more and more unto the perfect day. These unusual visions are so impressed upon the mind as never to be effaced. Sometimes, when our eyes are suddenly opened to these new and beautiful revelations, he appears to vanish from our sight, and then we wonder how our hearts burned within us at his near approach and wonderful expositions of his truth.

In a general way our expectation is in him, but he delights to appear often as the unexpected Guest at the moment. He has a new picture of his love and power to present, a new call to greater usefulness and richer attainment. His presence with us is therefore partially concealed, for we could only endure his great glory on occasional periods. When we are endowed with glorified body and immortalized spirit, then we may see him face to face in the fulness of his beauty and power.

The Lord's Freeman

THURSDAY, December 5. I Cor. 7:22. "He that is called in the Lord is the Lord's freeman." Civil and religious freedom is the ripe fruit of a plant whose root is in personal freedom, that is to say, the freedom of the individual man. Freedom of spirit is the first condition of political liberty. Without freedom of mind there can be no social safety or national greatness. It has been discovered to be a grievous error to confer sovereignty upon a people before they know what freedom means. Is freedom liberty to do what we please? Then God himself is not free! Perfect freedom is perfect obedience to law. "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." There is no freedom but by obedience to law. Just because sin is lawlessness, it is also slavery. To be governed by impulses, desires, caprice, is personal serfdom. Dr. J. G. Holland's figures are clear: "A bird is free while it is in the air, a fish while it is in the water; man must find his native element and live in it." What is our native element? It is in God we live and move and have our being. One of the great facts of Christianity is that man is out of his element and that Christ came to set him free. In the exercise of the freedom he confers we have the largest opportunity for the use of our highest faculties. In the possession of that freedom there is not iron enough in the universe to imprison our spirits. "They are freemen whom the truth makes free and all are slaves beside."

The Fight of Faith

FRIDAY, December 6. I Tim. 6:12. "Fight the good fight of faith." We speak of the Church militant, the church that is engaged in warfare. Why is there such a church? Being God's creature of grace and receiving his fondest attentions, the Church is for that reason an object of hatred to the powers which stand arrayed against the Lord. The church of God is despised, hated, maligned, and persecuted for his sake, and for his sake its members must wage war against his enemies. The Saviour said to his disciples: "If ye were of the world, the world would love its own: but since ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you." Christians may have enemies for no other reason than because they are Christians. They do not fight to wreak personal anger upon their opponents; they do not engage in the battles of the Church from motives of private revenge, for insults which they have received, or because it pleases them to see others humbled. A Christian must never mistake the play of his passions for holy zeal. The reason for his warfare must be, not the disagreeable person, but the ungodly principles and actions of his opponent. Otherwise his wrestling will be a carnal affair and a disgrace to the Church. For it will be seen that he is using the holy Word of God in his warfare, not so much for asserting the truth, but to cloak vanity and cruelty. Therefore, it is well to heed the apostle's cry: "Fight the good fight of faith."

The Submission of Job

SATURDAY, December 7. Job 1:9. "Then Satan answered the Lord, and said: Doth Job fear God for naught?" The devil claimed that Job would curse God if he lost all his earthly treasures, and the heavenly Father allowed the testing. How he stood the trial, after property, health, loved ones and everything was gone, is revealed in this remarkable book. Job triumphantly exclaimed, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." "I know that my Redeemer liveth. I shall behold him and not another." "I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee."

Job made no complaint against God for his reverses. He was submissive to the divine will, saying, "The Lord gave and the Lord taketh away; blessed be the name of the Lord." Would it not be a crucial trial for Christian millionaires to descend to beggary, for a king to lose his crown, for health to give way to horrible illness, for all the loved ones in the family to be called to the eternal world, and for the wife to side with enemies and critics while they chided him for his sins?

Job knew he had been a sincere follower of his Lord. He could not solve the meaning of his great affliction, but he believed some time he would understand. He knew his God was able to deliver him and that he would if it were best for his kingdom; that he could make all things work together for his good and for God's glory. He was willing to drink the cup put to his lips, as Jesus did in the garden; peace came to Job after patience. For one hundred and forty years Job lived and flourished, and the Lord gave him twice as much as he had before. If the universe were on one side and God on the other, the true Christian, like Job, would forsake all material riches, health and earthly happiness for the Almighty alone, exclaiming, "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none on earth I desire beside thee!"

A Story Having for Its Theme the Reconstruction Period After the Great War

Copyright, 1918, by Charles M. Sheldon

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

THE town of Bradford was decked with flags and bunting in honor of the home-coming of Ambulance Company 241, in which Richard Ward had served at the steering-wheel of the ambulance, losing his right hand at Château-Thierry, while his brother Albert met a hero's death. After the celebration Richard and his father, Rev. Dr. Ward, sat in the latter's study and talked about Dick's future, a problem which was complicated by the loss of his hand and his engagement to Requa Randall, to whom he also looked for advice in this matter. Dr. Ward's sermon on the first Sunday after the return of the soldiers decided Dick to become a foreign missionary. Chaplain Hunter, who had been submarined in the Mediterranean, unexpectedly turned up. Bert Chandler, fiancé of Esther Ward, also decided for the foreign mission field. Dick was surprised at the great changes for the better in the state and nation which were recounted to him at the breakfast table the next morning. But the thing that impressed and disturbed him most was the fact that Rufus Randall, father of Dick's fiancée, had been indicted for profiteering.

CHAPTER FIVE

FOUR blocks away up the street stood Mr. Randall's large house, the handsomest in Bradford. Strangers and visitors were taken past Randall's, as the show place of the town. It sat back in a whole block, surrounded by elms and tall shrubbery.

Dick had been in the habit of calling at all hours, and when he rang the bell he almost knew Requa would open the door, for they were early risers at the Randalls'. When she appeared and greeted him with a happy laugh, at first, for a few minutes of happiness, he forgot all about the real object of his call. He had been away so long from all home joys that it seemed to him almost like a dream to be with the girl he loved so deeply and gladly. And nothing was said about the future, the present was so joyous with hope.

But Mr. Randall passed through the hall, and Dick saw his big form and heard his heavy step as he went on toward the front door.

"Is your father going down to the mill? I want to see him."

"I'll call him." Requa went out into the hall.

"Father, Dick wants to see you before you go down."

"All right. I thought I heard his voice." Randall smiled as Requa drew him back into the room.

He greeted Dick heartily, for he liked him and knew Requa's devotion to this one-armed soldier boy who had so gallantly won the Croix de Guerre.

"I want to see you alone," Dick said a little stiffly.

Requa looked anxious. "I hope it's not anything very terrible," she said, as she went out.

Dick did not reply, as Mr. Randall closed the door. Outside in the hall, Requa stood a moment very gravely. She did not intend to listen but she could not help hearing a loud exclamation from her father. Then, trembling a little, the girl went upstairs to her own room. She was there for half an hour, when she heard the door of the room downstairs suddenly opened and some one came hastily out of the room, opened the front door and went out of the house.

WHEN Mr. Randall had closed the door and turned to Dick, who was standing in the middle of the room, he could not have anticipated Dick's reason for this interview. Least of all was he prepared for his own part in it.

Rufus Randall was one of hundreds of business men in America who had found in the Great War an opportunity to make big money. He counted himself a good patriot because he bought liberally of Liberty Bonds and subscribed largely to the Y. M. C. A., the Red Cross and the Armenian Relief.

He had also, with the shrewd cunning of his type, put up a large hospital in Bradford and endowed it generously. Bradford people generally regarded Randall as their leading citizen, as he was beyond doubt their richest. No one had thought of him as a profiteer until very recently. No one but himself knew what his profits were, or at least not until a government expert had examined his books. The mills employed some 2,000 persons, two-thirds of whom were women, and his wages were higher than those paid in Bayview or Carlisle. People generally regarded Randall as a philanthropist, and if they had been putting down his occupation in Who's Who they would probably have so designated him.

There is no doubt he so regarded himself. The last thing in the world he ever thought himself to be was a hypocrite. What the people of Bradford thought of him, he thought of himself. Only a few clear-headed and morally balanced men like John Ward had so far caught a real glimpse of the man as he was, unscrupulous, eager for the popular approval provided it did not cost too much, self-centered in his money-making, taking chances on the government overlooking his particular transactions on account of his reputation for patriotism and generosity, pouring the one personal affection he had clung to about Requa, his only child, absolutely selfish so far as other people were concerned, unless it was convenient for him to concede something to them—this was Rufus Randall, mill-owner, hospital-builder, first citizen of Bradford in his own estimation, pleased with himself and his prosperity and well disposed, at this particular moment on this particular morning, toward himself and the young man who was engaged to his daughter.

"Well, Dick," he said good naturedly, as he closed the door, "no use to ask why you have come over so early, eh? You won't want to detain me very long, I'm sure."

"I've come over to see you about Requa."

"Yes, of course. Well, I feel good-natured this morning. What is it, Dick?"

"Mr. Randall—" Dick was talking slow and thinking fast—"do you know what a number of us in the church, in father's church, have decided to do?"

"No, what is it?"

RANDALL and Requa belonged to a prominent church in Bradford which had not yet joined with the other churches in the federated movement.

"I have decided to be a missionary."

"A what?"

"A missionary."

Rufus Randall stared at Dick in genuine astonishment.

"You a missionary!"

"Yes, sir."

"The last thing in the world—"

"Yes, that's what I thought. But I have made up my mind. And that is where Requa comes in. My future will probably be somewhere in Palestine or the East, after I am through with the necessary preparation. Of course we want to be married before we go and—"

Randall broke in on Dick, who with the Ward bluntness was coming directly to the point of his interview.

"Wait a moment, young man. Let's get down to practical matters. First of all, let's start clear. Do I understand definitely that you have positively on an impulse and with very small consideration decided to make the—the business of a missionary your life business?"

"Yes, sir."

"On an impulse?"

"You might call it that."

"I never heard of such a thing. It's not practical."

"It's as practical as making money," said Dick, beginning to warm up under Randall's sharp questions.

"But you haven't had time—you—I asked Requa here last Saturday if you had any business plans and she said you hadn't any. And now you say you have decided on being a missionary and going to—where did you say?—Madagascar?"

"Palestine," said Dick grimly, "where little children and young mothers have been starving to death in very practical ways."

"But you—well, you say you have definitely decided on this sort of life as a life work? Being a missionary?"

"Yes, sir. It's clear enough to me. Of course it will take me some time, I don't know just how long, to get ready to go over. But the thing I came to see you about was Requa. Of course it means her going with me—"

"Never! Not with my consent, Mr. Ward! I regard the whole thing as absurd and visionary. Look you!" Randall suddenly pointed a big heavy finger at Dick with a favorite gesture. "What will you have to support a wife on as a missionary?"

DICK realized his weak position at this point and for a moment he hesitated. Then he boldly answered.

"I don't know—not yet. But missionaries are not allowed to go out unless they are married, and when they do go, they have a decent living. I shall be able to support my wife."

"Have you any money saved up?"

The question was sharp and blunt and "practical," and Dick's answer was a little surprise to Bradford's most practical citizen.

"I had $500 in the bank when I left home. I have been able to save $1,000 during the war. And Albert's insurance money was left to me, some $8,000, payable in quarterly instalments. I have enough to get married on."

"Oh! Ah! Um! I see. But your plan is fanciful. A missionary! Requa would die, away from all her usual home comforts. It is not practical."

It was at that point that Dick, recalling some of his war experiences, and especially the events that occurred in Palestine with the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A. and the Missionary Relief Committee, lost control of himself. He had been holding himself in check with splendid poise, remembering his father's caution. But now he seemed to see again that picture by the Jaffa gate, the baby with the dry grass in its mouth.

"Practical! Mr. Randall, nothing else is practical except the Gospel of Jesus Christ. What have we been fighting for over there? Why have all the moneyed crowns and thrones and businesses of the world been unable to stop the killing and the hate and the awful waste of life? Because they are not practical and never have been. I tell you, missionaries are the only really practical people there are. For if the world had spent its brains and money and energy in sending missionaries all over the world the great war that we have just had would never have occurred. I salute the only really practical person this world ever saw, Jesus Christ my Lord, who told his followers to go into all the world and make disciples of the nations!"

DICK was not given to heroics, but somehow he suddenly found himself on his feet, and his left hand went up smartly in salute, and he stood at attention, a flush on his face and a look in his eye that betrayed his unusual outburst.

If Randall was impressed by anything he never showed it.

"That's all right, if you feel that way, but the business of a missionary is not for girls like Requa. I've always believed it was man's business, and women ought not to be asked to go into it any more than into the fighting ranks of war."

"But Requa has promised to be my wife, Mr. Randall."

"That may be, but she did not promise to be the wife of a missionary. She will never have my consent to such a life. No matter what you say about it, it is a precarious, poorly paid, exhausting and killing sort of a life, if we may believe the missionaries themselves, and will oppose Requa's participation in it with you. I'm used to plain talking, and you are getting it from me now. I like you well enough, Dick, as an individual, and I admire your war record, —no man in Bradford more than I do,—and I should be proud and pleased to have you as a member of the family; but I love Requa more than I love you, and she is all I have left, and" (he spoke with a sudden passion of which he was at times honestly capable in a heavy impressive manner) "I am not going to have her life rubbed out in the treadmill of a missionary's wife. She is not strong enough physically to endure the hardship. I tell you, Dick, she was not born for such a life, and I will not consent to such a sacrifice. And that's my ultimatum."

"But what if Requa is willing to have the life with me?"

"She will never go against my wishes."

"I will see about that!" Dick got up suddenly and started across the room. Randall watched him with curiosity, but apparently no fear of the result.

Then, without shifting his position or even raising his voice, he said:

"Sit down, Dick. I have an offer to make you, that I honestly want you to consider. If you go to raising the question with Requa, it will create a lot of unpleasant feeling either way. I know he will never go against my wishes; it isn't that, but I believe we can settle this matter more satisfactorily."

DICK stopped half way across the room and sat down in the nearest chair. He had not the slightest hint of Randall's plan, and as he went on unfolding it, Dick listened at first, as if Randall were proposing it to another.

"Why not settle this thing on a sensible business basis, Dick? I like you and believe in your ability and your future. I need just such a bright, alert, keen-minded fellow as you in the mills. I've been short-handed all through the war, as every one has been. I need at his minute a reliable man to take charge of my shipping department. You could learn the business inside a year or a year and a half at most. You can put your capital, all you wish, into the business. With your ability, in time you could succeed me. If you should have children, they would be well cared for. Your father and mother need you at home after all this separation. It is not just the thing to leave them to a lonely old age. It is not fair to take Requa away from me, or to try to persuade her to leave me. I need her near me. You can get married at once and come right here to live, until you have your own home. That's my offer. Isn't it more sensible than your plan? Isn't it a thing that appeals to your own sense of what is wholesome and natural? Come, Dick! Come, my boy! Requa is out there now in the hall probably, waiting for you. Go right out there and surprise her by telling her you have accepted an offer to go into business with her old dad and may in time become a partner in the business."

Talking with his father on the evening of this same eventful day in his life, Dick confessed that as Randall's offer became more real to him, the greatest emptiness of his life assailed him to accept it, marry Requa, and settle down.

And then, the next moment, his whole soldierly nature rose up in resistance, and he felt that he was a traitor to the best he had chosen, and to the world's real needs as he had seen them himself over in Europe, and he found himself saying, calmly enough, but with the full strength of an assurance that he could not say anything else:

"I can't do it, Mr. Randall. I have made my choice before God. I cannot repudiate that without being a coward and a liar. I cannot and I will not make denial of my convictions to go into all the world."

Randall, at that, lost control of himself. He had made the offer in good faith and in his most seductive manner as a business proposition. To have it turned down abruptly by this young man who had no experience and no prospects angered him greatly.

"Then you can make your choice and go your way. But Requa will not go a step with you. Fool! To reject an offer into the best business prospect in Bradford or the state! Why, in ten years you could be in my place, you fool!"

THE next moment Randall was sorry he had spoken in anger. But it was too late. What he said and the way he said it roused Dick tremendously. He forgot his father's calm warning to remember he was not Randall's judge and executioner, forgot he was Requa's lover, forgot all that was at stake in the matter of Requa's possible attitude if her father refused his consent to her going away, and with only the memory of what Dr. Ward had said about Randall's profiteering, Dick burst out, regardless of all consequences. And added to all the rest, as he sat there that morning facing the father of the girl he loved, and who, he hoped, would go with him as his wife, was the scene in front of the Jaffa gate, and the young mother with the starved baby, and the cry of "America" rang in his ears and called out against this man who had taken advantage of the great world tragedy to line his own pockets. News of affairs at home had come to the boys at the front in a somewhat irregular and desultory way, but the word "profiteer" had become well known, and the company was in the habit of speaking of this sort of man at home as the "American Hun." As Dick recalled a scene at the second battle of the Marne, he saw, as he drove his car back during a counter thrust of the enemy, one of the American marines plunge his bayonet clear through the body of a German, draw out the weapon, throw the soldier back, step on his head, crushing it clear out of sight in the horrible mud, and with a yell spring like a wild beast on another German who had been close behind the first. The whole monstrous scene flashed out of Dick's memory as it flared up again in the fearful ending. For as the marine plunged forward, his face lighted up with the blazing light of a burning pile of foodstuff, a shattering bomb struck the marine full in the chest, tearing the upper torso apart, and the sacrifice was complete as the fragments fell scattered over the red soil of blood-soaked France, one of thousands who died that day for human freedom.

And here at home, at his ease, sleek, well fed, self-centered, self-satisfied and physically safe, was a man who called himself an American and was willing that the marine should give his life, and boys like Dick be mutilated for life, while he made his exorbitant profits at home, nursing what conscience he had by building a hospital or buying Liberty Bonds as a good investment financially.

WHAT Dick said under the impulse of passion provoked by the entire interview was simply this:

"I wouldn't be in your place, Mr. Randall, for all the money the war has cost. Your place! If the government finds you guilty of profiteering, your place may be and ought to be a state prison!"

For one moment Randall sat perfectly still, staring at Dick with a rage that turned his cheeks first white and then purple with passion. Then he started up, and for a second Dick thought he was going to strike him. But Randall, after raising a clenched fist and holding it up a moment, suddenly dropped it and laughed.

"Profiteer! You are not my judge as to that! I have a clear case with the government. But I don't have to defend myself with you. I—"

And at that point, as if not certain of himself, or as if assailed by a fear he did not wish to betray to Dick, Randall got up abruptly, went out of the room, walked heavily through the hallway and went out, closing the door with a bang. That was what Requa had heard and she came down at once not

Your Dime Goes as Far as Her Dollar

Every dime you spend for Quaker Oats buys you 2,000 calories of food.

(The Calory is the energy unit used by the Government in its food comparisons)

In other foods, at this writing, the cost of those 2,000 calories runs about as follows:

Cost of 2,000 Calories
In Quaker Oats	- - $.10	In Halibut	- - - $1.06
In Round Steak	- - .82	In Canned Salmon	- - .66
In Leg of Lamb	- - .96	In Canned Corn	- - .60
In Veal Cutlets	- - 1.14	In Canned Peas	- - 1.08
In Salt Cod	- - 1.56	In Potatoes	- - .26

So a dime's worth of Quaker Oats yields as many calories as a dollar's worth of meat foods, on the average.

Some foods run up to 15 times the Quaker Oats cost, measured on this basis.

But Quaker Oats means more than money-saving. It is better-balanced, more complete than meat foods. It is almost the ideal food.

With food cost where it is today, these facts should be considered. You can lessen that cost and live better by using more Quaker Oats.

Except in Far West and South

Quaker Oats Bread

1½ cups Quaker Oats (uncooked)
2 teaspoons salt
½ cup sugar
2 cups boiling water
1 cake yeast
¼ cup lukewarm water
5 cups flour

Mix together Quaker Oats, salt and sugar. Pour over two cups of boiling water. Let stand until lukewarm. Then add yeast which has been dissolved in ¼ cup lukewarm water, then add 5 cups of flour.

Knead slightly, set in a warm place, let rise until light (about 2 hours). Knead thoroughly, form into two loaves and put in pans. Let rise again and bake about 50 minutes. If dry yeast is used, a sponge should be made at night with the liquid, the yeast, and a part of the white flour.

This recipe makes two loaves.

Quaker Oats Muffins

¾ cup Quaker Oats (uncooked), 1½ cups flour, 1 cup scalded milk, 1 egg, 1 level teaspoon baking powder, 2 tablespoons melted butter, ½ teaspoon salt, 3 tablespoons sugar.

Turn scalded milk on Quaker Oats, let stand five minutes; add sugar, salt and melted butter; sift in flour and baking powder; mix thoroughly and add egg well beaten. Bake in buttered gem pans.

Quaker Oats Cookies

Mix dry 2 cups Quaker Oats (uncooked), 3 cups flour, 1 teaspoon cinnamon, 1 teaspoon salt.

Mix 1 cup sugar, 1 cup lard.

Put 1 level teaspoon soda in a small cup of sour milk. Add this to sugar and lard, then add dry ingredients, roll thin, cut in squares and bake. Raisins—2 cups—make an excellent addition. (2030) knowing whether it was her father or Dick who had left the house.

Dick met her in the doorway and she saw at once that something serious had happened.

Dick drew her back into the room and said,

"Requa, do you know what I came to see your father about this morning?"

"No."

Dick told her briefly, emphasizing his own choice and making clear his conviction that in making his choice he had deliberately decided his lifework.

"Do you mean, dear Dick, that we would have to leave Bradford and go to Palestine or some foreign country to live all our days?"

Requa asked, and Dick noted with a strange sinking of his heart that she was trembling as if with fear.

"Yes, that is what it will mean. It will be a life of adventure and of sacrifice. But—"

"Father will never consent."

"Yes, he has just told me so. But what do you say, yourself, Requa? Will you go with me?"

Dick put the question with the usual Ward characteristic of abrupt and positive coming to the point.

THE girl hesitated. She had been luxuriously brought up. Her father had been to her, since her mother's death and until Dick Ward had come into her life, the one person in all the world to whom her thought and affection had gone out.

Now, suddenly, and it seemed to her cruelly, she was confronted with the necessity of making a choice which either way it lay meant disappointment and trouble for one or the other of the two people who were most to her.

In that moment of hesitation Dick read his worst fears. The woman who really loved him, he said to himself, should have answered at once without reservation, "Where thou goest I will go, thy God shall be my God, thy people my people."

But what he heard from Requa after that painful pause was this question:

"Is there no other way? Do you mean to make this choice for us both?"

"I have already told you, Requa," Dick was saying calmly enough outwardly, though inwardly his heart was in a tumult. "It rests with you to choose between your father and me."

"Give me time, Dick! Don't ask me to decide it now at once!"

"But what difference will time make, Requa? The choice will always have to be the same. Will you live your life with me, or not? If I were asking you to come into a wrong or a doubtful life that would be different. But—"

Requa's face expressed fear, doubt, indecision, deep trouble. It had not been hard for her to love her absent soldier. And when he came home, no one in all Bradford had been prouder or happier than she.

But for almost the first time in her easy-going life she had to make a serious decision. It is doubtful if she understood in any adequate way Dick's decision in its purpose and its sacred meaning to him.

Then suddenly her face lighted up and almost laughed as if she had discovered an answer to her perplexity.

"Dick, oh, Dick, why do you have to go as a missionary? Why can't you stay here and do just as much good? Father was saying only yesterday that he needed a man in the mills, in the shipping department, I think it was. I know if I ask him he will let you have the place. Dick, dear Dick, think how long you have been away! And now you plan to go again. Think how happy we can be here at home! You are so quick you can learn the business in a short time. Perhaps in time you would succeed father to the business, find yourself actually in his place. And we could get married, Dick, as soon as you wish, Dick—that is, as soon as I can get ready—and father would love to have us stay here, Dick, right here in this house. It is so big, we could have a big corner of it all to ourselves. Oh, say you will, Dick; say you will, and we shall all be happy."

AGAIN, talking frankly with his father that night, Dick confessed to him that Requa's appeal seemed to him more than he could resist. Never had she looked so lovely. And he had been gone so long from all womankind from all the possibility of a home of his own. Once in critical passages there more thought that he would ever live to enjoy such bliss seemed so remote that nothing but a succession of miracles could make it real. And here stood now really within arm's reach personified in this glorious, radiant blushing girl who had promised to his wife and make with him that sacred and adorable place, home. Why not take this gift of the gods and, without too many serious questions, be happy?

And then again, as in the case of his father, Dick seemed to see down the trenches lines of foully bespattered human beings, the semblance of humanity, gashed with innumerable tokens of sleeplessness, watching, wearing shell-shock, bearing in their bodies a in their memories the marks of the cruel war, holding grimly on to the things the flag stood for, willing to suffer and die a hundred horrible deaths in order that the world might be saved and millions happy instead of a few like himself and Requa; and then over the trenches flamed the ghastly banner flying above Old Glory, blazoned with the word "Profiteer," with Requa's father's name after it, branded with the terrible treason. And she was asking him, the soldier, who had risked his life to free the world from just such egotists as Randall, to become a possible partner in the business that had stained on it, after he had won the crown on a battlefield with a pure and loyal patriotism that no one could ever question.

REQUA was very near him; no moment she would have yielded to his embrace, but his first word was like a blow that she stepped back hastily and threw her hands up as if to ward her lover.

"Requa, do you know I could never enter into a partnership with your father's business, because the government at this moment is making an official examination of his books, and he is likely to be arrested and fined as a profiteer. Requa, I would just as soon repudiate my American citizenship and go over to the Germans and try to see the commercial business of which it have been stripped by the war, as to associated with your father in a business which he has apparently conducted for his own selfish profit while other men have been fighting for the world's life."

Now, Requa Randall, like other girls daughters of rich men in America, who know nothing of the intricate affairs of business, if she ever thought of it at all, thought of it as a source of her physical happiness. And her father was to her, kind, indulgent, affectionate father.

Like a blow on her heart, here stood her lover, the person she loved next to her father, charging him with monstrous wrong and actually calling him selfish. And she drew back, threw her head, and said the first angry word she had ever spoken to her soldier lover.

"Richard Ward, my father is the soul of honor! Any one who tries to cast dishonor on him is no friend of mine! Do you understand that?"

Dick received the blow standing. He was pale, and sweat stood on his forehead.

"Requa," he said gently, "I do not think you understand your father's business. I don't feel able to argue with you. I have received the answer to my question. You are not willing to go with me. Oh, Requa! I do not know how I can bear it!"

Yielding to his feeling Dick suddenly rushed past Requa out into the hall and had opened the door just as Requa, swiftly repentant of her anger, came running out and crying,

"Oh, Dick, dear Dick, don't go! don't understand it all! You know, love you dearly! Dear Dick, I am sorry I will!"

But Dick did not even turn. He slipped the door and ran down the steps, and Requa ran up into her own room, flung herself on her bed and sobbed, alternately speaking her father's name and her lover's, crying out in the first deep grief of her not over deep heart.

A Prayer on Thanksgiving

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

ONCE more the fading year has reached November, once more the autumn air is swept with snow; and we who kneel before you, God, remember the blessings you have given us to know. We think of fruits and grains that now are lying in heaping harvest for each eager hand, and though the year is tired now and dying, a hymn of praise is rising from our land!

Three hundred years ago the Pilgrims, kneeling, gave thanks to you as we give thanks this day; gave thanks as frigid winter time came stealing upon them as a wolf steals on his prey; gave thanks for grain and fruits that they had planted among the boulders of the half-tilled soil; gave thanks while pallid winter sunbeams slanted across wan faces seamed with fear and toil.

They, as a little band, had gone together across a dreary stretch of winter sea; they had braved dangers of the wind and weather to find a land of peace and liberty. And many of them perished ere they found it; and yet they raised an altar at your feet, and grouped themselves in utter faith around it, and thanked our God for home—and food to eat.

Today, dear God, we, too, will kneel before you—it is the harvest of the year today; but as we kneel we silently adore you—our hearts are full, we have no word to say! Our hearts are full of praise that is undying, for, over all the land the Pilgrims found, a wonder-lag is now in triumph flying, and bells of peace have rung with joyous sound.

Dear God, we thank you for this harvest season, for fruits that you have given us again. But, God, the harvest isn't quite the reason; our hearts are full—we thank you for our men that you are giving back from war and fighting, that you are sending safely from the strife, back from the freedom orch they have been lighting—our men, exultant, mad with youth and life!

DEAR God, the harvest comes this year with laughter, with trumpets blowing and with flags unfurled—with banners flying from each war-worn altar, to shout the triumph of the weary world. The harvest comes with more of real Thanksgiving than Pilgrim fathers dreamed of long ago! The harvest comes with men returning, living, while drums throb out and martial bugles blow.

Across the sea the guns have done their reaping for four long years of bitterness and pain. The sound of women and of children weeping has swept across torn lands like autumn rain. Ah, yes, the harvest of the guns is vivid in crimson patches on the winter's snow, and where the battle fields are scarred and livid, and where among the wheat the poppies grow, the guns have reaped and we have watched heart-broken, with helpless hands, and feared you did not care. But, God, this season you have sent your token—the dove of peace sweeps through the frosty air.

There will be many, God, who greet this morning of peace with eyes that scarcely see the gleam of golden autumn sun that is adorning the world until it is a glowing dream. Their eyes are blinded, God, with tears of sorrow for those who, gallant, sailed across the foam, for boys who will not see the glad tomorrow—for boys whose feet will never turn toward home. Thanksgiving Day, for them, will tell the story of some new grave, unmarked, across the sea; some grave that stands for the undying glory of One who lied that peace at last might be! Upon his day of praise we ask your blessing to be with those who gave this greatest gift—we ask, God, that your hand will lie caressing upon their hearts and yet be strong to lift their souls from bitter grief that knows no ending, and tears that fall, a burning, ceaseless flood. God, help the ones who now, in grief, are bending above a sorry harvest, drenched in blood.

And there are others, God, who look half-fearful across the ruined homes that once they knew, who offer thanks to you, however tearful, as very tired little children do. They do not know the holiday we cherish, they do not know of our Thanksgiving Day; they only know that by the sword men perish, and that the dream of peace seemed far away, until at last the gray-green columns crumbled, and swept like tides that leave the blood-red shore to gasp once more alone—grim columns, humbled, crushed by the failure of their own mad war! These people do not speak our tongue, their voices are raised to you in words we cannot guess—but, God, each heart so sorrow-bruised rejoices, and every voice is raised your name to bless. They may not know Thanksgiving, but they feel it; so, God, upon our nation's holiday, bind up each wounded life with love and heal it, and let your pity brush the scars away!

DEAR God, this is the time when we remember the blessings that we know who feel your love. Now that the fading year has reached November, now that the autumn haze hangs blue above with fields that ripened in such golden measure, now that the fruits are heaped in glowing piles, we thank you for our nation's countless treasure; and for the khaki-clad in steady files who are returning to our nation's borders, serenely through the lands of strife and fear—a band of heroes, marching under orders that bring them back from Over There to Here.

O God, the Pilgrim fathers knelt before you, to thank you for their first small harvest feast. We, echoing their praise today, adore you with hearts too full to say the very least of what we feel, for peace is with our banners, and peace is singing through our native land—and peace rings in each heart with glad hosannas, a peace that only you can understand.

Dear God, we thank you for this harvest season; we kneel before you silently, but when we say our praise aloud, O God, we thank you for bringing home the harvest's crown—Our Men!

"Red Triangle Sunday"

THE nation has given generously of its funds to maintain the physical, mental, moral and spiritual welfare of our armies.

During the post-war period, when 150,000 to 200,000 men will be on leave all the time, when the education of thousands must be continued, when temptations will be inviting on every hand, the need for workers will be greater than ever before.

The immediate future challenges the churches to send their finest men—men of good health, ability, and character, with a large capacity for friendship—to serve our boys until they are returned to their homes.

December 1 has been designated as the Red Triangle Sunday, when the pastors of 35,000 churches will be asked to preach a special sermon on the vast Y.M.C.A. program and the unequalled opportunity for service during these next few months. The number of workers will be secured if every pastor lends his energies to the enlisting of the finest men in his church.

The Magi of Today

THE Sunday School Department of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief has prepared a special exercise for use at the Christmas season in connection with the special Sunday school offering for this important and urgent work. The title of the exercise is "The Magi of Today." The program, prepared by Anita B. Ferris, is a strong program, at once dignified and entertaining. It may be used in connection with a Sunday service or on a week night. It bristles with interest and information, and it is characterized throughout by swift movement and human interest. The platform arrangement is simple and easily within the reach of small schools, while it may be elaborated for use in the larger schools that desire it. This program will be supplied without cost to any Sunday school that will carry out the plans of the committee for an offering for the work of the Armenian and Syrian Relief.

Joseph Made Ruler of Egypt

International Sunday School Lesson for December 8
Genesis 41

The Fruits of Faithfulness

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WHAT a masterpiece the story of Joseph is? The fortunate youth is shown at the beginning, and then comes woe upon woe until one can scarcely see a ray of hope! Hated by his brothers, sold into foreign slavery, falsely accused of a vile treachery, thrown into prison, forgotten! Yet through it all we see the sure development of noble character, the increasing manifestation of a high fidelity to ideals, the growth of a great soul under adversity. Though a slave, he wins for himself the position of trust and responsibility, until he is in charge of his master's house. When tempted most insidiously he proves himself a moral hero, and becomes sure of his own trustworthiness in temptation—an assurance that is worth all it costs. In prison he is soon a "trustee," advising, assuming leadership by his administrative ability, rising above the limitations of his position. Hence when at last opportunity knocks at his door he is ready, and his rise is more rapid and at least as spectacular as his fall.

What a remarkable illustration this man's life affords of Jesus' parable of the Talents! "Thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will set thee over many things."

The Days of Opportunity

Many of our boys and girls have reached that stage of experience where they need to realize the richness of the opportunities that are before them. Some of them are failing because of a foolish conviction that they have no chance of usefulness, of success. It is for us to inspire them to high resolve and purpose, to remind them of the great difficulties surmounted by men and women in other days, like Joseph. "Today," says one of the world's most successful men, "there are a hundred golden opportunities to one of fifty years ago." This is conspicuously true of the greatest of all tasks, the evangelization of the world. What a call goes up for successors of Livingstone, and Judson, and Mackay of Uganda! The work of Africa and Asia calls insistently for men and women of the largest hearts, of the best training, of the most unselfish purposes. For years to come America will have a wondrous place in Christian leadership.

The days of opportunity are here and now. It is only the grumbler and the weakling who can find no chance. Joseph found golden opportunity even in slavery and in prison, opportunity to achieve and to lead. Robert B. Malone has written a stirring poem on the perennial nature of opportunity.

They do me wrong who say I come no more
When once I knock and fail to find you in;
For every day I stand outside the door,
And bid you wake and rise to fight and win.

Wail not for precious chances passed away,
Weep not for golden ages on the wane;
Each night I burn the records of the day:
At sunrise every soul is born again.

The poet goes on to tell us that there are no conditions prohibitive of happiness and achievement. Even those who have failed may try again. Our God is the very God of Opportunity:

Though deep in mire, wring not your hands and weep;
I lend my arm to all who say "I can."
No shame-faced outcast ever sank so deep
But might arise and be again a man.

Art thou a mourner? Rouse thee from thy spell!
Art thou a sinner? Sins can be forgiven!
Each morning gives thee wings to fly from hell,
Each night a star to guide thy feet to heaven.

The Blessings of Adversity

So strange a thing is life that we can readily see in the tales of the heroes of other days that adversity has its blessings. Would Joseph have become a type of Christ if he had continued as the spoiled favorite of a wealthy father? Would St. Paul have become the Christian hero had his pathway been one easy conquests all along the line? Would Lincoln have been Lincoln without poverty and the struggle, without agony and the strife? Indeed, is not Crucified Redeemer the only sufficient and effective Saviour of the world?

Adversity is God's agency. We that in others' lives, why not in our own? To his chosen saints God always said, "I will refine thee as silver is refined, and will try thee as gold is tried." It is a great compliment to soul when God sees in it sufficient precious metal to justify smelting it from the dross! Men do not waste their energies trying to refine mere inert ore. They are seeking pay-dirt, they are crushing ore. So it is with God, who sees in man the greatest treasure of the universe. Therefore James says, "My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into manifold trials!" That is strong doctrine, indeed! But as iron ore is crushed to part the metal from the metal, and put through the blast furnace to get rid of the slag, and heated anew and forged to put temper into the steel, so we can see such a man as Joseph going through the mills of God, a noble soul in the making.

The wise man of old wrote, "If thou faint in the day of adversity, thy strength shall be small" (Prov. 24:10). How do we measure up? Sage Thomas à Kempis wrote in his quiet cell, "For occasions do not make a man frail, but they do show what he is." What then are we, as manifested in our testing times? As one who has known the Christian hope, I feel ashamed and rebuked when I read the noble and devout words of wonderful Epictetus, that "slave maimed in body, a beggar through poverty, and dear unto immortals." Think of it! Harder than Joseph's lot though like unto it, a boy sold as a slave, abused and tortured until permanently crippled, the victim of unspeakable drudgery and yet somehow learning to read and write, thinking the highest of spiritual thoughts, abounding in thanksgivings to God. He says that since so many men are spiritually blind he feels himself obliged to sing hymns to God the more on their behalf! Think of that man, and of heathendom, writing words of his challenge to you and to me! It is a prime illustration of faithfulness to ideals, faithfulness to God as He pleased to manifest himself to even the least of his children. The fruits of Epictetus' fidelity to the spirit were his lifetime, blessedness and serenity of heart amidst all things black and hard, and afterward immortal honor among thinking men everywhere.

Loyalty the Watchword

During the great war we have learned to know the meaning of loyalty, a word that ought to be a key-word in religion. For a man to be loyal to God, to God, his neighbor, his country and himself is to have the foundation for character and achievement. You see this keen sense of obligation kept Joseph's course true in the most critical hour of his career, his temptation. In the moral problems and the conquest of sin constitute the really crucial moments in a man's life. Joseph would not be Joseph had he failed in the trial of his great temptation. But he remembered to be loyal to man and to God. He could not violate the confidence of his master and take advantage of the trust imposed on him. Neither could he sin against his holy God, who has impurity and loves holiness. "How then can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?" His loving loyalty to the Egyptian made him forbear even from telling his own side of the story and saving himself by wrecking other lives.

Life, talent, time, are bestowed upon us as stewardship. "Now it is required of stewards that a man be found faithful."

Marion Harland's Corner

IT is not surprising that the following request should come from the thrifty little state which is set as thickly with real homes as her orchards are with fruit-bearing trees. In no state is village life more attractive. Sociability and hospitality go hand in hand with refinement, and what I am proud to have named "Kitchenly-kindness" is of perennial growth:

I live in a suburban town which is, nevertheless, quite wide-awake to the pressing questions of the day.

This afternoon, at a meeting of the Red Cross chapter—which used to be our sewing society—the matter of making Christmas presents this year was warmly discussed. We all feel, of course, that we ought to practice economy in this, as in everything else. But I was somewhat shocked to hear a well-to-do woman say calmly:

"Nobody ought to make Christmas gifts at this time! It was always an arbitrary custom, with little reason or heart in it. To spend money this year out of sentimentality, and because it has become a habit, is actually sinful."

The discussion that followed was, as I have said, warm. While most of us felt that it would be a real sorrow to give up the dear old custom, and that it would leave a sort of blank, desolate feeling in every home, we could not deny that there was a grain of truth in what this member said.

I recollect reading, years ago, an article written by you, entitled "Christmas Blackmail," that dealt with this subject. I spoke of it to our party and it was resolved to appeal to you in the present perplexity. You have been teaching us all these months how to provide palatable yet inexpensive foods for our families. Can you find time and space for a talk with us of Christmas war gifts as you have told us of war breads and war cakes and meatless dishes?

This is a bold request, but we are sorely puzzled!—MRS. S. C. G. (New Jersey).

It is easy to see that the "dear old custom" of which our correspondent writes would die hard in the Jerseys, if die it must. Our member wrote better than she knew in predicting "the sort of blank, desolate feeling" that would fall upon every household if the sacred practice of exchanging love-tokens upon the Great Birthday commemorating the Supreme Gift were discontinued.

SETTING aside, at the outset of our conference, the thought of what I banned in another Yuletide paper as "Christmas Blackmail," i. e., giving to those from whom we expect a return, or to those who have established a claim upon us, let us take up the question propounded by the circle of Red Cross workers.

If you can save money for the purchase of Christmas gifts, and time for fashioning them in no other way, deny yourself luxuries and even some comforts in order to fill the holiday treasury. To begin with, do not lower the value of love-tokens by buying what may be styled "trumpery" and "gimcracks." Infuse intention and meaning into the humblest offering.

If you can make something with needle, pen, or brush, which you know will convey a direct message to friend or relative, you unconsciously infuse the poetry of daily life into it.

Study utility, but in this spirit. This is eminently a practical age. We are in no humor for gewgaws!

Decide definitely in your own mind that what you design, or make, or buy, will be especially suitable, for some reason, to the friend who is to receive it.

"She was thinking of me when she did this!" sends a thrill to the heart of the least imaginative, as one traces that thought in each line, or stitch, or thread.

DESCENDING to particulars, I name first among holiday tokens of "peace on earth, good will to men" books. I premise that no other class of gifts demands more tactful adaptation to the taste and fancy of the prospective owner. Be sure that the friend who recognizes a direct tribute to her peculiar liking and desire in the volume done up in tissue-paper and bound with ribbon stamped with holly or mistletoe will appreciate gratefully the fact that it is a message from your soul to hers—not a haphazard purchase of the "most popular gift-book of the season." The selection made, stamp it as your gift to this particular friend by writing upon the fly-leaf your name below hers (or his), with a line or two fraught with significance to both of you.

A subscription to a periodical which will be welcomed every week or month as your representative is a graceful offering. It says, mutely, that you had the series of "calls" in mind as a sure evidence of your continued regard and wish to be remembered.

A certain religious weekly has never failed to quicken in my heart fond reminiscences of him who, fifteen years ago, subscribed for it in my name.

NINE times out of ten, intimate acquaintances and relatives are best pleased with useful articles made comely by the donor's own handiwork.

Our linen-draper is offering now, at reduced prices, a tempting array of Turkish toweling and crash for wash-cloths. Why not combine with a sister, a cousin or a neighbor of like means and tastes with yourself, and buy a dozen towels? They range from forty to forty-five cents apiece if bought by the dozen. Divide them between yourselves and "treat" as you choose. You may cut one or two into suitable lengths for wash-cloths and, after overcasting the sides and ends with fast-colored cotton or floss, work in one corner of each the initials of the one to whom you mean to send it. Thus cut and garnished, a set of four is a gift not to be despised by your sister-in-law, or the next-door neighbor with whom you have had many a conference upon the problem of reconciling liberal living with narrow means. You have redeemed a useful thing from homeliness and proved your regard for her in every stitch.

Finish the ends of the towels with a neat, firm hem and trim this with crocheted edging wrought by those same deft and glad fingers. (That they are "glad" is where the poetry comes in!)

Send a couple, by parcel post, to a country cousin who likes to have excellent towels in nursery and bathroom, but is too busy to think of trimming them. She will treasure these as "guest-towels," as you will see at your next visit. If you have the skill sufficient to justify the embroidery of her initials at one end of the towels, the value of the gift is enhanced.

NEAT handkerchiefs of pure linen are among the bargains offered by the aforesaid merchants, in anticipation of the holidays. It is not possible for man or woman to have too many handkerchiefs. They never go out of fashion, and they are warranted to keep—in locked drawers! You may combine with other women in the purchase of boxes holding six or a dozen—lettered and plain—or they may be bought singly at reasonable (war) prices. Buy a plain handkerchief and work in one corner the initials of the one you would honor by the deed. If to this you add a pretty edging of tatting or crocheting, there will be no trace of economical devices in the result.

I was pleased and surprised last Christmas by the gift, from a stranger-friend in a distant city, of a dainty handkerchief edged with a border of tatting done in lavender silk and decorated with my initials done in the same color. Another came by the next mail, trimmed with fine white cotton tatting and also initialed. Thus I know whereof I speak in indicating one of the ways in which you can dignify the commonplace.

John and the boys will display with just pride a couple or more of handkerchiefs marked by wife and mother.

"To me, each stitch is eloquent!" said a soldier-lad, lifting the embroidered initials to his lips. (Poetry again!)

Small linen handkerchiefs, bordered with tatting, or knit or crocheted lace, make pretty plate-doilies and center-pieces.

Tires, hoses, boots, shoes, hose, water bottles, rubber gloves, etc., can all be easily and quickly mended with this outfit. The variety of uses is amazing. This wizard will stop the leak in anything at's rubber.

Home Repair Guide Free

Send your address for our valuable, new page book "Guide to More Tire Mileage," containing many illustrations that show you how to avoid tire troubles and get more miles from your tires and tubes without extra help. Obligation. Send while these books last.

Miller accessories are produced by the makers of the Miller Uniform Tires—the talk of the tire world because of their Uniform Mileage and their cog-like tread that is Geared-to-the-Road. Uniform Mileage is solely a Miller achievement accomplished by Uniform hand-work that makes all Millers wear alike under like conditions. The result is a breed of long distance tires—not occasionally some that give great mileage—but 99 in 100. Miller Cords are the big buoyant tires whose elastic action absorbs the road shocks, they wear longer and easier than any other type of tire built, including our own Uniform Fabric Tires. If you can't get them, be sure to when you can.

Easiest Reading Bible

The Bible has never been published in any form in which the reading of it has been made so attractive to both old and young as in the "International" CHRISTIAN WORKERS' BIBLE

By an entirely new plan, a thread of red ink, running from Genesis to Revelation, binds in one harmonious whole each leading topic. All the precious truths which lie hidden under the mass of unconnected matter and escape the mere reader are brought to light and tied together.

The Rev. Jesse Lyman Hurlbut, D.D., the popular authority in Bible themes, has arranged on this plan Three Thousand Selected Texts.

PROMINENT PEOPLE'S OPINIONS

John Wanamaker: International Christian Workers' Bible is an advance on anything hitherto attempted in making the Bible usable.

Lyman Abbott: Valuable to Christian Workers in their endeavor to get at the teaching of the Bible directly and immediately, and not through the medium of commentaries.

BOUND IN GENUINE LEATHER, divinity circuit, with overlapping covers (like illustration), round corners, gold edges, red underneath. Size of page 5 1/2 x 8 1/2 inches, beautifully printed in extra large clear type on extra fine paper; also contains Latest Teachers' Helps to Bible Study.

The Christian Workers' Bible will be SPECIAL SENT FREE for examination, ALL CHARGES PREPAID. If it does not please you, return it at our expense. If it does please you, remit special price. Published at $4.75, but for a limited time we offer this handsomest, most usable Bible at the Special Price of only $3.75. Send no money but fill in and mail coupon.

AFTER JANUARY 1, 1919 CHRISTIAN HERALD WILL BE $2.50

IN common with other national publications The Christian Herald has been forced to increase its subscription price. Every single item that goes into the making of the Christian Herald—paper, postage, printing, engraving, wages, etc.—has increased enormously in cost. And the costs keep right on increasing.

One of two things was necessary—either to lower the standard of the Christian Herald or to increase the subscription price. You would not want the standard lowered, and we will not lower it. In fact, the Christian Herald must keep right on getting better—and bigger—and finer. The Christian Herald has an important mission to perform, and will need the co-operation of all.

An opportunity will be given to all our readers to renew at the present price of $2.00 a year as the increased price of $2.50 a year will not go into effect until January 1, 1919. No matter when your subscription expires—even if you have recently renewed and your subscription does not expire for many months—you can have your subscription extended at the present rate. This enables you to still have the Christian Herald at $2.00 a year, in spite of the ever increasing cost of manufacture, if you renew before January 1, 1919.

All of These Clubs Will Positively Advance 50 Cents or More After January 1, 1919

Subscriptions are for one year. Renewal subscriptions are extended for one year from the date of expiration. New subscriptions begin with the current issue. Magazines can go to different names and addresses except in a few cases noted otherwise. Canadian postage on other magazines is usually 50 cents additional; foreign postage $1.00 additional.

om the Timothy who grew up. When the boy in his trig uniform had swung along the streets in the ranks of other uniformed boys, on that last day, it was the little Timothy, that polite and polite, Mrs. O'Mally saw through her eyes and waved to with her apron. It was the little polite, swate Timothy who had been cruelly struck down now his innocent "young youth." Those who love never do really grow up, and the nely old washerwoman had loved Timothy, grass-greens and all. Everybody loved Timothy. Everybody was sorry for the sorrowing family and for grandmother and the Marrieds. If it had been a little place they lived in, instead of the great city, the flags would have been at half-mast for Timmie, Nelly was sure, and secretly it hurt her at they were not, anyway. Her own, in her room in the third story, was at half-mast.

"I—I'm at half-mast, Timmie," Nelly sobbed, her cheek against the little mourning flag. "All of us are. But other keeps on smiling—Timmie, I wish I knew whether it would comfort or—or break her for me to call her 'lummy'—she's so lonesome to be lled 'Mummy'!"

THE morning of what would have been Thanksgiving if there had been one in the Brady house was clearly wet and cold, with little stinging nips unwary ears and noses. It was altogether a splendid day to give thanks in their dear live sons Over There, as the Marrieds had given thanks a year ago. Nelly was remembering, as she slipped hurriedly down the stairs to turn the calendar in the living-room face to the wall, to hide the face of the day. It is strange that neither she nor any of the others had thought to do it before. But Virginia-Nan was ahead of her; was already done. The two girls came together at the threshold of the room and instinctively their arms went round each other.

"Sh!" whispered Virginia-Nan softly. "We must not breathe above a whisper, all. It would be so good if Mother would sleep through!"

"Yes, oh, yes, but she won't. She's awake up there, now, putting on her or little smile. Maybe she's been awake all night—Virginia-Nan, do you think it would comfort her or break her if we sewed our gold star on?" The gold star they had made themselves after many, many trials, out of lovely golden ribbon. Should they take the little white flag down out of the window and w it on over Timothy's little live blue star? Or not do it? They went to the window together, still undecided. But Mother had been there ahead of them. They saw at once. Timothy's star was golden.

"In the night—I know in the night," murmured Nelly. She had a vision of other, without the splendid little smile, down here in the night-time covering the little blue star with its sad little cry of gold.

Outside on the street, even as early as this, family groups were hurrying by on their way to catch trains to some gay Thanksgiving festivity. Little children at customarily dragged on the leading ends went joyously on ahead today, tagging the mothers and the fathers. Some of the groups were new babies long white coats going to their first Thanksgiving.

"Member Mother's telling about trying Timmie to Grandmother Brady's his first Thanksgiving and how when she went to show him to Grandmother he'd turned clear round in his smnet and only his little red back-o'-s-head showed! You weren't born, Nelly, nor I, but Martha and Grace are, and Mother said Martha cried she is so ashamed of the baby! But Grace piped out: 'The front side o' him's a rling, Gran'mother—nobody's han'me in the back o' their heads.'"

THE sisters' faces were softly smiling, but their eyes were full of tears. The baby brother who had so sadly disgraced himself in his little bonnet before they were born was shining in the golden star in the window in front of them—a hero brother for all the world to see. He had not disgraced himself Over There.

"There comes a messenger-boy—down there, see?" Nelly said suddenly. "Oh, doesn't he remind you of—the other one that came? This one's whistling, too, and maybe he's going to tell somebody their soldier's dead—maybe somebody's going to find out on Thanksgiving Day. I'm going to shut my eyes—you shut yours. Don't let's see where he goes! I can't bear to see!"

And while their eyes were shut he came whistling up the street to them. It was to them he was bringing his news, but there could be nothing sad or terrible now to bring; it had already come. Why should he come whistling up their path to their front door?

"Tullygram—sign here." The sisters had met him at the door wondering. It was Virginia-Nan who signed there. Nelly had caught at the brown envelope and torn it open in a sudden strange panic of haste. She had read it!

"Washington, District of Columbia, November 27.

Timothy Brady, by mistake reported killed in action, is alive and well. Brady mistaken, in cable transmission, for Brody."

"What is it?—who rang the bell, dears?" Mother was saying, and then Mother was reading. The dear stricken soul of her leaped at the beautiful words and broke into a joyous sobbing.

"Tell Father—Father! Father!" she cried. "Timothy is alive and well! Our boy that was dead—alive and well! Nelly, read it to him—you can read it yourself without any glasses, Father!"

"Somebody telephone Grandmother and the Marrieds quick! Oh, quick, somebody!"

"Tell them to come right away and we'll have Thanksgiving together," cried Nelly. "Timmie's safe and well! Not killed in action—safe and well in action! It's Thanksgiving Day today!"

THE house was a-teem with thanksgiving. It sang aloud from hearts too glad to hold it; it filled the house with song. Everyone read the telegram and then read it, in turn, over again. It was always "safe and well."

After a while they could think of Thanksgiving details. Nelly thought of the extra mince meat in the jar in terms of pies, plenty of pies. She went crazily about, singing: "Pies! pies! Timothy-pies!" She got out the kneading-board and the rolling-pin.

It was Mother who thought of the little star-of-gold in the window and who ripped it off with tremulous fingers and kissed the live little star beneath—that said to all the world Alive and Well! Later, a little later, when she had time out of her rush of joy, Mother was to think of the boy for whom her boy had been mistaken—who was killed in action, not alive and well. Curiously, it was flyaway little Nell that thought of him now, even in her rapturous excitement and joy. She had flown up to her room to "wireless" to Timmie. In the midst of her message, chattered in her clear, high key, she thought of that other boy.

"Oh, Timmie, that boy you wasn't! That Brody Timothy, instead of Brady one—Timmie, if I wasn't so happy I'd cry. Do you think I ought to cry? Timmie Brady, as if I could find a tear today! But I'll keep my little flag at half-mast for him, Timmie."

In the Brady house there was Thanksgiving Day, after all, and no day in all the world was Thanksgiving, Nelly said. It was a beautiful sight to see Mother smile.

He Was an American

"I SAW one boy in a hospital, who had lost both legs and both arms. I said to him, 'My lad, you surely had hard luck at the front,' and he gave me a smile which has become a permanent possession with me, as he said, 'Well, I am glad I have my health and strength left.'—From a speech by Secretary of War Baker.

Christmas Present

"Closer to the Almighty"

THIS is the philosophy of Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter, the author of "The Harvester," "The Girl of the Limberlost," and other marvelously successful stories—to bring those who read her books "closer to Nature and the Almighty." Mrs. Porter has opened the eyes of thousands to the wonder and glory of the world about them.

Mrs. Porter's stories all have, as a fundamental reason of their existence, the author's great love of Nature. To impart this love to others—to inspire many hundreds of thousands to look for the first time with seeing eyes at the pageant of the out-of-doors—is her gift of rare quality. In writing of "The Girl of the Limberlost," Mrs. Porter said: "This comes fairly close to my idea of a good book. The book can, and does, present a hundred pictures that will draw any reader in closer touch with Nature and the Almighty."

Mrs. Porter's novels are not only wholesome and clean, but they are romantic and cheerful. The people who live in their pages do things and accomplish tasks worth while. Over 3,000,000 copies of Mrs. Porter's books have been sold.

RARE CHANCE TO OBTAIN A SPECIAL EDITION OF MRS. PORTER'S NOVELS.

By a special arrangement with the publishers of Mrs. Porter's works, we procured a special edition of six volumes of the most popular stories by this talented writer. The first edition of these books which we ordered was quickly taken by our readers. Another edition was immediately arranged for, and these have just been received. The six volumes were printed from the plates used in the original edition—the type being large and clear and the paper of exceptional quality. The books are bound in fine red cloth with gilt tops, making them especially attractive. There are twenty-five full page illustrations.

We have only a limited number of this second edition, and when they are taken, we cannot print any more, as the government now prohibits the use of the heavy paper used in this edition. Those who desire this set of six volumes should order them at once.

THE SIX TITLES:

"AT THE FOOT OF THE RAINBOW" "THE HARVESTER"
"THE GIRL OF THE LIMBERLOST" "LADDIE"—A TRUE-BLUE STORY
"FRECKLES" "SONG OF THE CARDINAL"

OUR OFFER—SEND NO MONEY NOW

WHILE the edition lasts you can secure this special six-volume set of Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter's novels at an exceedingly low price and on free examination. This set of six volumes is published solely for readers of the Christian Herald. It may be obtained only in connection with a year's subscription, but we have made the terms of payment so liberal that all may take advantage of this offer.

Get More Eggs On Less Feed

Egg prices this winter will undoubtedly be the highest in the world's history. Those who know how to feed to get winter eggs will reap enormous profits, while improper methods mean a loss.

Prof. T. E. Quisenberry, one of the world's greatest poultry authorities and President of the American Poultry School, Box 1012, Leavenworth, Kansas, has issued a 16-page bulletin on "How and What to Feed For Heavy Egg Production and to Cut the Cost of Feed." This Bulletin will be mailed Free to interested readers, while they last. Hundreds of hens fed and cared for under Prof. Quisenberry's direction have laid 200 to 298 eggs per year, while the normal production according to U. S. Government reports is 60 to 80 eggs per year. Write today for your copy of this valuable Bulletin. (Advertisement.)

Wonderful Egg Producer

Any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called "More Eggs." Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs," and you will be amazed and delighted with results. A dollar's worth of "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit maker, write E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 9498 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., who will send you a season's supply of "More Eggs" Tonic for $1.00 (prepaid). So confident is Mr. Reefer of the results that a million dollar bank guarantees if you are not absolutely satisfied, your dollar will be returned on request and the "More Eggs" costs you nothing. Send a dollar today or ask Mr. Reefer for his free poultry book that tells the experience of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry.—Adv.

"More Power to 'Old Glory'"

I want to say that the Stars and Stripes duly arrived O. K. and is very satisfactory, and I thank you very much for prompt attention. I have it hung up all day long on the front porch, and everybody admires it. We tell them where it came from and wish there was one on every porch in the country. Young People's Topics for December 8

Begin Now

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics, II Cor. 6: 1-10

NO MATTER how long the world waits for the consummation of the present age, it will remain true for each individual that now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation, and that the greatest happiness, the only joy that lasts, the only hope that has a sure tomorrow, is found in accepting the Lord Christ as our personal Saviour. There is a world-wide tendency to put off the day of salvation. The world seduces us with its allurements; pleasure raises its painted face before us, saying: "You cannot have me and Christ." A false spirit of business success tells us that we cannot serve Christ and make money to buy the things our ambition or our vanity may crave. It says it is necessary to do things in business of which Christ would not approve. And when we, half-yielding and half-resisting, point to some man eminent in the church, whose wealth is known, whose reputation for Christian living is accepted, the spirit of business answers, "You do not know how he got it." And the spirit of our riotous young life urges us to have our fling, to sow our wild oats, before we turn to piety, and so we put it off and lose golden hours and splendid days in pursuits that yield us nothing permanent, the accomplishments such as they do yield sooner or later turning to ashes in our hands. All the time we feel that some day we will be a Christian. Yes, that is our intention, but not yet. But today is the day. No structure is ever complete before it is begun. No tree survives the winter's blast which has no roots. No building greets the rising sun without a foundation. Sometimes an imposing building falls through the weakness of the structure underground. Sometimes the lordly tree falls to the earth because its roots have rotted. Sometimes a life, hailed by the world, claimed as successful in glowing colors by many sycophants, falls ignominiously because its roots were rotten, its foundations laid in weakness. Every day we are building the foundation of the structure of our life, which cannot be fully Christian if the foundation is laid in pleasure and lust and a denial of conscience. The noble life which we plan shall be ours only if we build on a substructure of sterling worth and honest purity. Christ saves us from our sins but not always from their penalties here. The time to begin is now. The promise is for today; there is no promise for tomorrow.

Our Bond of Fellowship

Epworth League Topic. Mal. 3: 16; Heb. 10: 24 (Epworth Herald Day)

THIS meeting has been planned to bring before the chapter the claims of the Epworth League's own publication, the Epworth Herald. The Epworth Herald binds together the chapters scattered up and down the land, unifies their policies, inspires their leaders, broadens their vision and makes them better Epworthians and better Christians. That is its office, and, so far as we know it, that is its fruit. We think likely that in most chapters it is not as visible a bond of fellowship as it might be. There is no better investment than a subscription to a periodical which exalts the Christ and inspires to service. That has been the mission of the Christian Herald through the whole of its forty-one years. It has also been its joy and the bond which bound it to the Christian Herald Family. The things of Christ are, however, greater than the limits of any publication, and the Christian Herald has welcomed the birth of such papers as the Epworth Herald, the Sunday School Times and the Christian Endeavor World, and has been glad to see them increasing, even as it itself increased, the increase of all marking the wholesome growth of spiritual things and the increasing hunger for spiritual food on the part of the people in their wide-spreading parish of our Lord, America.

Christ. It is intolerable to hear a name used in coarse jest. These days when no man is respected who does not show his colors." Turning upon the offenders he added, "You have run the black flag of the devil. I run up the pure white flag of the Lord Jesus Christ." Then he raised that old hymn of the Church,

Jesus shall reign where'er the sun
Doth his successive journeys run.

The song went sweeping down through the car carrying everyone before it. (C) after another joined in, until finally the two offenders were caught in the grip of a cleansing tide of sacred melody swirling about them, and they united the song they had learned in Christ's homes.

My friend, we are passengers on a jolting, onrushing train of human progress. At this moment it is swinging around a sharp curve into a new, better day. Doomsday is behind us. Kingdom Come is before us. Certain of our fellow travelers have run up the black flag of anarchy, tyranny, barbarity, and wickedness. I challenge you to run up your flag with its pure white field, its passion cross and stars of blue. Show your colors! Show Christianity the world will always respect.

"He had seven stars in His right hand." Is your star in Christ's hand? Heaven grant it.

A Church's Generous Gift

F. E. WHITTLESEY, treasurer of the First Presbyterian Church, Corry, Pa., writes: "Enclosed find check for $100 from the First Presbyterian Church, Corry, Pa., for use of your war relief fund, wherever it may be needed at the present time."

This timely gift has been apportioned in equal amounts for the widows and orphans of other sufferers of the war, in France, Syria and Armenia, Palestine, and Belgian refugees in Holland.

It's the Chassis that Gets the Try-Out

—An Advertisement to Car Dealers

These Cadillac cars under test are typical of the care exercised by the most successful car builders to assure quality and reliability in the fundamental working parts of the chassis.

Your customer often buys a car simply because of its body lines, finish, quality of upholstery, accessories and conveniences.

But sooner or later the purchaser finds out—by what happens, and what doesn't happen, on the road—that there is another car inside the one he or she has bought.

That inside car expresses the maker's conception of the value of performance and durability.

The outside car makes the first impression on your customer—but the inside car leaves the last, and permanent, impression.

There is no advantage in passing over the chassis in silence: for every word you express in sincerity now, means a better satisfied customer later on.

Tell a man what he can expect of his starting, lighting and ignition system and that he cannot abuse it, and he won't blame you if it sometimes needs attention.

Tell him his engine will someday have to be overhauled, and why, and when the time comes he will be glad to pay for good service.

Tell him about lubrication, carburetor adjustment, brake adjustment and so on and he'll thank you.

Tell him how the adjustability of Timken Bearings enable him to take up the effects of wear, avoiding repairs and replacements, and how they preserve the efficiency of gears and axles.

Thus if he has some trouble elsewhere, he won't condemn the car. He'll realize how many troubles are due simply to neglect. He'll appreciate all the more his Timken Bearings, and other parts that never need repair and will say, "There's a lot of good stuff in this car after all." He might never give the car credit for some of these things, if you don't tell him—because they haven't called attention to themselves.

Timken Bearings are but one of many quality points in a high-quality car, of course, but it's worth while to know each one.

If you'd like to be on the mailing list of the Timken Magazine, which publishes many valuable pointers about Timken Bearings, drop us a line on your business letter-head.

NEXT to a healthy body and a contented mind, nothing has so much to do with the preservation of the hair as the soap used in the shampoo.

Ivory Soap cleans hair and scalp thoroughly. Its copious lasting lather absorbs the dirt, and then rinses out easily and completely.

Containing no uncombined alkali, it does not burn the hair nor make it brittle, and it does not destroy the scalp's natural secretions. The hair dries soft, silky, fluffy, the Ivory shampoo putting it in the condition which makes for continued health and beauty.

The German High Seas Fleet which, on November 21, in the North Sea, once the German Ocean, dipped its flags to the Allied squadron

Germany Gives Up Her Fleet

A Historic Surrender in the North Sea—American Troops in France and Luxemburg—Marshal Petain Enters Metz

ONE of the most picturesque sections of the eastern coast of Scotland is the Firth of Forth, where the river of that name, in common with half a dozen minor tributaries, forms a great bay, some fifty miles long and from ten to fifteen miles in width, opening into the North Sea. Thirty miles outside of this spacious waterway there took place, on Thursday, November 21, the final scene which marked the end of Germany's sea-power among the nations. This was "The Day" to which the officers and men of the German High Seas Fleet had been trained to look forward, and which they had boasted as the day which was to inaugurate Germany's control of the seas; but Fate had decided otherwise. It was "The Day" not of triumph and world victory, but of humiliation. In accordance with the terms laid down by the Allies for the armistice, it was the day for the surrender of the German High Seas Fleet to the victorious Allies.

Over four hundred vessels of the Entente powers, including the British Grand Fleet and powerful American battle squadrons and a number of French cruisers, steamed out at three o'clock in the morning from their bases along the Scottish coast to the place appointed for the great surrender. For three days there had been a fog along the coast, but on that eventful morning the weather cleared, until the noble outlines of the Firth could be distinctly seen. There were in the Allied Fleets altogether 60 dreadnoughts, 50 light cruisers and nearly 200 destroyers. Admiral Sir David Beatty, the intrepid commander of the Grand Fleet, was on the Queen Elizabeth, flagship of the Allied naval powers. The Grand Fleet put out to sea in two single lines, six miles apart, leaving a wide channel to enable the surrendering fleet to go in the center. The American battle squadron included five dreadnoughts, commanded by Rear Admiral Rodman, and operated as a unit of the British Grand Fleet. The squadron had been on duty with the Grand Fleet for the last fifteen months.

On the day preceding the surrender of the German warships, an imposing naval ceremony took place at the great naval base at Rosyth, on the Scottish east coast, when King George and Queen Mary were entertained aboard Admiral Beatty's flag-ship, the Queen Elizabeth, and the King reviewed the Grand Fleet preparatory to its leaving the base to accept the surrender of the German ships. The representatives of the American and French navies were present at the ceremony. The plan of the surrender was fully explained and approved and was carried out without a hitch, eighteen hours later.

Between eight and nine o'clock on Thursday morning the first and main instalment of the German High Seas Fleet reached the appointed rendezvous. Contact with the surrendering vessels had been made by wireless at an earlier hour. The first German ship to appear against the horizon was the Seydlitz, one of the fastest German battle cruisers, flying the German naval ensign. After her came the other big vessels, dreadnoughts and battle cruisers. They had left Kiel Harbor on Sunday to keep the rendezvous. One by one they were taken over by Vice-Admiral Beatty.

It was a long program, but was carried through with dignity and impressive decorum. When the German naval ensign had been lowered from the last of the surrendered vessels, Vice-Admiral Beatty on board the Queen Elizabeth steamed slowly through the long lane of Allied men-of-war, every one of which bristled with big guns. The crews of all the Allied warships were piped to the rail. Bands struck up "God Save the King" and the great fleet, spread out over miles of sea, cheered to the echo in honor of the history-making event which had just been concluded. It seemed as though the shouts of triumph and the music might almost be heard on shore.

So ended the spectacle for which the whole world has waited. As the German ships came up to the battle line through which they were to pass, the scene was probably the most impressive of the kind ever witnessed. There were seventy-one German warships in all—vessels that since the beginning of the war have carried the imperial German standard across the seven seas, and now they were sailing for their last port—the port of Oblivion. At 9.30 they passed up the sea-lane, in full view of the united fleets of the Allies, of which every vessel was fully manned with victory flags flying in honor of the great event.

First came the dreadnoughts, then the battle cruisers and last all of the destroyers—seventy-one vessels in all. Slowly they passed, while thousands of eyes were fixed upon the huge German ships, which had been the strength of the Kaiser's navy, but which had only had but one real sea-fight. Then came the battle cruisers, light cruisers and destroyers. The list of those to be surrendered was short three vessels, but these, it was explained, would be yielded up later on. One of the German submarines had broken down on the way and two battleships are under repair. A German light cruiser, while coming with the other vessels to surrender, struck a mine in the North Sea, and was so badly damaged that she sank. Her crew, however, were saved. Eighty-seven submarines had been surrendered by November 24, the submarine merchant cruiser Deutschland being among the number.

The whole program of the surrender occupied about five hours. The following is a partial list of the larger vessels interned, which was cabled from Berlin via Amsterdam, the complete list of the seventy-one vessels not having been given out by the Admiralty at the time this was written:

BATTLESHIPS

Bayern	28,000 tons	Koenig	25,293 tons
Friedrich der Grosse	24,113 tons	Koenig Albert	24,113 tons
Grosser Kurfuerst	25,293 tons	Kronpr. z. Wilhelm	25,000 tons
Kaiser	24,113 tons	Markgraf	25,293 tons
Kaiserin	24,113 tons	Prinzreg't Luitp'd	24,113 tons

BATTLE CRUISERS

Derflinger	28,000 tons	Seydlitz	25,000 tons
Hindenburg, about	27,000 tons	Von der Tann	18,800 tons
Moltke	23,000 tons

LIGHT CRUISERS

Bremen	4,000 tons	Emden	5,400 tons
Brummer	4,000 tons	Frankfurt	5,400 tons
Dresden	tonnage uncertain	Koeln	tonnage uncertain

The German fleet will be taken to the Scapa Flow in the Orkney Islands, where Great Britain kept her Home Fleet before the war, and there it will be dismantled and interned.

On November 25 a combined British, American and French squadron sailed for Kiel and Wilhelmshaven to oversee the disarmament of the remaining vessels of Germany's once proud fleet.

Liberated Villages Wild With Joy

HAILED as saviours, welcomed by their own national colors mingling with the colors of freedom in the lands redeemed, Pershing's men during all the days of the week beginning November 20 continued the triumphant march of democratic victory. Crossing the sorely tried territory of Belgium and France into Luxemburg and German Lorraine, the Lorraine that was German before 1914, the "Dough-boys'" progress was a triumphant entry. In Lorraine, French at heart, though for more than forty years under German rule, until some of them spoke only German while loving France; in Luxemburg, whose pro-German court failed to represent its people; and in Belgium, from which the hated invader had so lately fled, the American troops were received as the harbingers of freedom. The Germans permitted only red and white and black materials to be sold. Nevertheless the people succeeded in finding the blue and from thousands of little houses, and in the hands of thousands of children, the barred red, white and blue of France and the stars and stripes of America were flung to the breeze in each village almost as soon as the last German had gone his way. Belgians flags securely hidden for four years waving bravely in the breeze of a new day alongside of home-made American flags, some of them short a few stripes, none of them standard as to stars, some even painted on paper when other material was unobtainable, witnessed the love which the redeemed people held for the nation whose intervention in the war they recognized as the deciding factor.

In leaving the former occupied portions of France the Germans, while destroying little, were careful to take with them all of the foodstuffs that they could lay their hands upon; the American army found it necessary to take over, as part of its work, temporarily at least, the feeding of the inhabitants of the villages it redeemed. But Luxembourg was more fortunate, and when the doughboys reached its gaily bedecked cities they found a reception which centered about great quantities of food and drink; some of it free—some of it well priced by the thrifty Luxemburgers. General Pershing, on November 21, issued a proclamation to the people of Luxembourg announcing that the passage of American troops through their country was necessary and guaranteeing the discipline of the soldiers.

The Grand Duchess of Luxembourg received Brig. Gen. Parker, in command of the American advance guard on November 22, and later in the day she received General Pershing, and standing beside him on a balcony of the Grand Ducal Palace reviewed the American troops which marched through on the trail of the departing Germans. The Luxembourg National Council issued a proclamation acclaiming the Entente and American forces as their deliverers.

THE American vanguard, on November 21, reached the little city of Arlon, in Belgian Luxembourg, and the 20,000 inhabitants gave themselves over to the welcome of the American troops. Hundreds and hundreds of fête trees, like our Christmas trees, lined the streets decorated with tinsel and Japanese lanterns, arches of fir branches curved overhead, the streets were lined with pretty girls, handsome women and cheering men, while every brass band that had ever existed in that part of Belgium was reorganized for the occasion. Thousands of home-made American flags waved everywhere and signs reading "Hail, Generous Americans!" greeted the boys at every turn. A special edition of an Arlon newspaper, carrying on its front page the heading, "The Day of Glory Has Arrived," was offered to the marines, who formed the first element of the army to enter the city, and it was sold out immediately. The homes were thrown open and everybody was gay and happy. The Germans had been gone but twenty-four hours and the boys in khaki looked like conquering heroes.

After the early days the German withdrawal was more orderly, the officers apparently making every effort to keep their men in hand, although individual soldiers were guilty of occasional excesses. The Germans also completely observed the terms of the armistice as to the surrender of guns and material, leaving an officer in charge of the surrendered equipment until an Allied officer appeared to sign a receipt for them. Nevertheless, on November 22 the retreating army began to show signs of getting out of hand and Germany was reported to be getting nervous over the prospect of the flood of soldiers which would soon overrun the Fatherland. German stragglers were being made prisoners according to the terms of the armistice and every day saw more former prisoners of the Germans reaching the Allied lines, many of them in terrible condition, insufficiently clad and all suffering from lack of food.

A great many thousand Russian prisoners also appeared before the Allied lines and during the first three days of the advance were turned back, but later they were permitted to go through and were gathered together in concentration camps behind the lines.

The British forces advancing through Belgium reached the field of Waterloo on November 21, part of their forces being within ten miles of Brussels.

British troops on November 22 entered the fortress city of Namur which after Liege gave the Germans considerable trouble on their sweep through Belgium. Belgian and British forces were reported in Louvain and nearly two-thirds of Belgium was cleared of the invaders.

KING ALBERT made a state entry into Antwerp on November 19, driving across the Scheldt with the Queen beside him in an open car followed by his Belgian veterans who had fought the boche in the swampy trenches of the Yser and for four years had kept one small corner of their land sacred against the invaders. Rain was falling and Antwerp was filled with a mist, but the spirits of the people rose triumphant and their umbrellas bore the colors of the Allies. As the King crossed the Scheldt the sun broke through the clouds, a symbol to the gathered thousands of the return of peace. Driving to the Hotel de Ville the King left his car and reviewed the procession of his troops, which was headed by a detachment of men walking very slowly with crutches and sticks with the banner of Belgium above them—veterans of the defense of Antwerp in 1914 against the German hordes, men who had placed their bodies between Antwerp and the big Berthas. Behind them came the survivors of the heroic little army of the Yser, machine guns garlanded as pretty toys, artillery and cavalry, helmets and sabers, banners and standards, a pageant of victory, set to the music of multitudes of bells, for all over Antwerp the bells were ringing, their clashing chorus mingling with the airs of the military bands, while the chimes in the Cathedral belfry pealed the "Marseillaise" and the people cheered and cheered again and broke the lines of the gendarmes in their eagerness to crowd upon their returning heroes and to welcome them home again. Following the review the King attended a great Te Deum at the Cathedral.

King Albert made his official entry into Brussels at 10:30 A.M. on November 22. Some of the government departments had by that time resumed their functions and the Belgian newspapers were again being published. Parliament was reopened on the 22nd and a new ministry was formed composed of six Catholics, three Liberals and three Socialists. The program of the new government was announced to include universal suffrage for all males over 21, a general election as soon as possible, freedom of labor and the establishment of a Flemish university. No action was to be taken immediately on woman suffrage.

"At the moment that you re-enter Brussels at the head of your victorious army, may I not express the great joy that it gives to me and to the American people to hail your return to your capital, marking your final triumph in this war which has cost your nation so much suffering, but from which it will arise in new strength to a higher destiny?"

After entering Brussels in state on November 22, to the accompaniment of the greatest demonstration of joy yet evidenced by any people in the reconquered territory, Brussels never having been conquered, but having fought by every means in her power during the whole four years of war, her fighting running all the way from passive resistance to open hostility King Albert addressed the reassembled Parliament. General Pershing was reported as sharing in this triumph of reconstruction. General Plumer represented Britain. The American minister, Bran Whitlock, had reopened the American Embassy on the previous day and was present at the opening of the Parliament. The King, after outlining the intention of the government for the extension of the suffrage and the improvement of relations between Flemings and Walloons said: "Belgium victorious and free from the neutrality that was imposed upon her... will rule her destiny according to her aspirations and full sovereignty."

Metz Acclaims Marshal Petain

GERMAN Lothringen has become Lorraine again. Metz, one of the most formidable bastions of Europe, was returned to France on November 19, amid frenzied rejoicing. The Tricolor floated from every window and the jubilant "Vive la France" stilled for nearly half a century, raised from thousands of voices in the fortress city that housed the German General Staff for eight hours before General Petain, made a Marshal of France, astride a white charger, viewed his triumphant troops as they marched with flying and battle playing before a statue of Marshal Ney in the square. The famous Cathedral bell, the motto on which read, "I announce justice," gave the signal for the bells in the city to peal forth a welcome to the liberators."

Jubilant throngs, among them young girls dressed in the traditional Lorraine costumes, lined the sidewalks. Save for little groups of German railroad postal employees and some other sour Prussians, everybody wore the colors of the republic. Though all the street and shop signs are in German, no word in that language was heard spoken. American flags, obviously of hasty home manufacture, were visible here and there alongside the Tricolor. Sectors of French battle-planes, circled and dipped above the housetops.

The crowds fairly roared their welcome to the columns of poilus wending their way through the city. At many points the younger folk broke into the horizon-blue ranks and hiked along arm in arm with the soldiers. Perfect order prevailed, although the turbulent spirits loaded the statue of the ex-Kaiser with chains and dragged the monument of Emperor Frederik from its pedestal. General Mangin could not lead his troops in this historic march because of an injury sustained through the falling of a horse a couple of days before. With the French were a detachment of 500 American troops, and possibly these received a greater welcome than the French. In the store windows and public buildings along the principal streets there were pictures of President Wilson. Pictures of President Poincaré, Marshal Foch and King Albert also were prominently displayed.

For three days the civilians of one little village had been looking for the Americans, expecting them every minute. There had been no school all week, and the children had been drilled in singing and flag waving to receive the advancing army.

Eastward of Metz advancing French troops were sweeping up the Rhine occupying towns which as fast as they were French again dropped the names which they had been known since '71 and took again the French names they had lost—one as Zaburn, now Saberne, where the insolence of Prussian militarism in the days before the war showed for an instant a burst of the flame which has seared the world for fifty-two months and which is now being extinguished by the moral force of the world.

A part of Camp Upton whence good soldiers were sent to France

The Fighting Deacon of Camp Upton

By ULSTER SCOTT

WITH the kiss of his mother still warm upon his cheek, the train containing Chester Masters and many others left Rockaway Beach Station, May 28, 1918, for Brooklyn, N. Y., where a great crowd had gathered with bands of music to see and cheer the boys going off to Camp Upton.

But Chester needed not the patriotic music. His thoughts were away back home with the loved ones left behind.

On arrival at the camp, the men were enrolled, and led off to the different companies to which they belonged, Chester being assigned to the — Company of the — Depot Brigade. Soon he found out that the boys among whom his lot was cast were a pretty motley crowd, none of them being overburdened with religion, and when "the last post" sounded and the time to turn in arrived some lively scenes and livelier talk abounded. But this was the moment to show one's colors, so Chester took out his Bible and read a few verses before retiring to rest.

In the big cantonment barracks where the men's bunks lay side by side there could be no privacy; therefore this practice of the young recruit did not remain unnoticed, and he was presently reminded by his comrades that nothing could be worse than a hypocrite. Indeed, the frequent counsel as "Don't be a hypocrite, old man," and before long he was known in the company as "the religious guy."

Despite all the coarse jokes and bantering, however, God gave the young Christian strength to stand up to him. His unwavering steadfastness to principle and abounding good nature soon told upon his comrades, until even those who most tormented him ceased their annoyance, and said, "Well, Masters is the right stuff after all."

Chester, who was anxious to enter the signal service, in filling out his papers made application for a place there. Moreover, word reached General Bell that he thoroughly understood the raising, care, and training of homing pigeons. His name was therefore considered for transfer to the Signal Service Corps, and after investigation he was accepted.

He was told to report to Lieutenant G——, and in a letter to his parents he joyfully informed them about it in these words:

"I am surely some guy now, for under an order from General Bell, Camp Upton is informed that Private Chester C. Masters is hereby transferred from the — Company, — Depot Brigade, to the Camp Signal Office. So I suppose I will soon be with the pigeons!"

His new surroundings worked no change in the habits of the young man, who, as "the religious guy," had to run the gauntlet among new companions.

One day word was passed round that three men from the Messenger Bird Division were needed to go to France, and the officer of the corps came round to see who they might be.

He said: "J——, you can go, and B——, you can go too, and as you will need a deacon to look after you when you get over there, I think we will have to send Deacon Masters along also."

From that time the name took hold, and Chester became known as "Deacon Masters."

One day the boys thought they would have some fun with the "Deacon," so they selected a big fellow of their number for a wrestling match, and defied Masters to throw him.

Good-naturedly accepting the challenge, in less time than it takes to tell the "deacon" had him down. Other trials of strength followed in which he was victor, so he won the title of "the fighting deacon," by which cognomen he is now known.

ONE Saturday, toward the end of the period of influenza quarantine, a messenger from the officer in charge came to the Carrier Pigeon Section, paper in hand, and informed the men that Captain —— desired to know "who wanted to work on Sunday."

Two or three names were entered, then he came to Masters. "Write down Masters does not want to work on Sunday," said the "deacon."

When the messenger returned, the entry was noted by the officer, who said, "So Masters does not want to work on Sundays. Well, we'll see about that!"

On Sunday Chester spent a happy day, attending church twice. Next day the officer in charge met him and said:

"So you did not work yesterday. How was that?" "Because it is against my principles to do so," replied Masters.

"Well, you'd be glad enough to take a pass for Sunday!" and the next week-end Chester was surprised to find himself the holder of a 72-hour pass.

God grant that the example of this young soldier may lead some others of our beloved boys in the army—who have more of Christ's religion in their hearts than they ever acknowledge in their lives—to enter the service of the King Eternal, who will make them "more than conquerors."

This Nation's Huge Task, the Feeding of a Hungry World

THE dawn of peace has revealed a Europe of which a great part is either in ruins or in social conflagration, with degenerated soils and depleted herds, with many of its peoples on rations and in varying degrees of privation, and large populations actually at the verge of starvation.

Vast responsibilities devolve upon our Food Administration. Herbert C. Hoover sailed for Europe November 16, bearing by common consent the tentative title, "Food Controller of the World." He will be given extraordinary powers. It is expected that he will go directly to Berlin and begin a searching inquiry into the German plea that unless the blockade is lifted millions of Germans will starve.

The new situation changes our domestic food policies and opens to us as a nation an opportunity of obligation of vast service. Not only must our ends be fed, but our former enemies also.

The United States Food Commission has computed a world's available food supply and finds that with its distribution and stringent conservation there will be enough for all. The main problem is that of transportation and distribution.

The world's balance sheet in the seven great groups of commodities shows approximately as follows: wheat and rye, sufficient supplies with economy in consumption; high protein feeds (for dairy animals), shortage of about 3,000,000 tons; other foods, sufficient supplies with economy in consumption; beans, peas and rice, sufficient supplies with economy; pork products, dairy products and vegetable oils, a shortage of about three billion pounds; beef, sufficient to load all refrigerating ships' capacity; sugar, sufficient for our normal consumption; coffee, a surplus.

Of the world total, to produce the above results, North America will furnish rather more than sixty per cent, and the United States, including the West Indies, will be in position to furnish a total of about 20,000,000 tons of food of all kinds annually, against our pre-European war exports of 6,000,000 tons.

In the matter of wheat and rye the large supplies that have accumulated in the Argentine, Australia and other inaccessible markets supplement the stores of clear wheat bread for the world. We are able from now on to abandon the use of substitutes in our wheat loaf.

We can export, together with other surplus countries, an apparent sufficiency of the coarse grains, that is, of oats, barley and corn. On the other hand, there is a world shortage, of wheat feeds, the seed and bean meals. This shortage will be somewhat corrected by our elimination of substitutes in bread.

Of our export possibilities in fats, the largest item is pork products. Eighteen months ago the only hope of a sufficient production of fats and meat for the world, either in peace or war, lay in the stimulation of production of the American hog. Yet, with all our supplies, the world will be far deficient in its normal supply of fats for two or three years at least. We must therefore exercise the intensest economy in consumption of pork if we are to carry out our high purpose of furnishing food to a famine-stricken world.

In sugar, at the present moment, all Europe and North America are living on much restricted allowances. If Europe continues on present rations, then the world supplies, now enlarged by rendering Java sugar available, are sufficient to provide our entire normal consumption provided Europe does not greatly raise its ration. The Food Administration has protected the fundamental supply to the American people by purchasing, in conjunction with the Allies, the next Cuban sugar crop. It has made such arrangements with the American refiners and producers as will assure a price of nine cents a pound wholesale for sugar during the next twelve months.

This being the new world-situation in food, the prime changes in our food policies can be summarized: We may now advantageously abandon the use of substitutes in our wheat bread, but will still require economy and elimination of waste in its consumption. For the present we need conservation in butter and condensed milk, and ultimately we must extend this to all the fats.

There is one policy which cannot change, and that is the vital necessity to simple living; to economy in all consumption.

There are conditions of famine in Europe that will be beyond our power to remedy. There are 40,000,000 people in North Russia to whom but little access with food can be obtained this winter. Transportation is demoralized in complete anarchy, and shortly many of their ports will be frozen even if internal transport now blocked by the Bolsheviks could be realized.

Getting Ready for the Peace Conference

IT began to appear, on November 22, that the decision of President Wilson to attend the opening, or at least the early sessions, of the Peace Congress, was part of a major plan which contemplated the assembling, so far as feasible, of the heads of all the states engaged against the Teutonic alliance in the war. A Grand Review of the victorious armies was being planned for Paris, and another Grand Review was to be held by the Allied fleets. These were to be reviewed by the Kings and Presidents and Premiers, and out of this assemblage of executives and political leaders was expected to come by full agreement, the resulting document of Peace, the Charter of the Liberties of a world redeemed from military domination. It was expected that President Wilson would complete his series of history-making addresses by a speech before the company thus gathered together.

Nor was it planned that this gathering should be only of those interested in the war as combatants. There was every evidence that those nations which broke diplomatic relations with Germany, though they did not go the length of declaring war, and those neutrals whose neutrality had been benevolent toward the Allied cause, would be represented in or heard by the conference. Also those other neutrals who were either sympathetic toward Germany or held to her by fear, were to be heard and every nationality and people which has struggled to be free, or which has been kept by political injustice from realizing its racial ideals, was to have a hearing, since this Congress is not to meet to impose the victor's terms—though it will do that too—but to so adjust the relations of men everywhere that there shall not be left one latent ember of conflict, whose smoldering might some day kindle again the flame of war.

There was considerable speculation as to the relative voting strength of the great nations and little states in the conference, but on November 22, it was said that this problem would be met by the settlement of all questions by agreement. No majority will be able to impose unjust or distasteful terms upon a minority. All must agree before decision is final. This does not apply, however, to the terms as they affect Germany and her former allies. It appears probable that they will have no part in the formation of the elements of the treaty which will be formulated by the nations which opposed them and by the neutrals and presented to them for their acceptance. They will have opportunity to be heard and the Congress will have no other purpose than to do exact justice; but the Peace of the World is not to be endangered by any agreement in any degree made in Germany.

The questions as to how long the President would be gone and as to how the executive department would be made to function from a position 3,000 miles from Washington both appeared to be settling themselves as time gave opportunity for the perfecting of plans. It was reported that Mr. Wilson would make his headquarters at the American Embassy in Paris, which is technically American soil, and that he would conduct official business there. The ten days allotted by the Constitution in which the President may consider a bill passed by Congress—at first an apparent obstacle—were covered by plans to keep swift dispatch boats ready to take the engrossed text of the bill abroad, vetoes, if made, to be cabled. Measures not being immediately vital could be held up after passage by the two houses of Congress, by withholding the signatures of the Speaker of the House and of the Vice-President. Conferences between the executive and the Congress, often necessary to the smooth development of legislation, would be made over the private wires between the two capitals.

The length of the President's stay abroad was left largely a matter of adjustment, the two weeks originally planned being lengthened to three, with Railroads. In accepting the resignations Mr. Wilson said: "For the distinguished, disinterested and altogether admirable service you have rendered in both posts. . . . I thank you with a sense of gratitude that comes from the very bottom of my heart." There was no intimation as to who would succeed Mr. McAdoo in either post, although the names of Congressman Carter Glass, of Virginia, Bernard M. Baruch of New York and John Skelton Williams of Virginia, at present Controller of the Currency, were mentioned as possibilities for the Secretary's post, while Mr. Walker D. Hines, who has been Mr. McAdoo's first assistant Director General of Railroads, was mentioned for the Director General's positions.

the vitals of the enemy's army and force him to surrender.

BRINGING THE BOYS HOME. The first men of the United States Army to sail for home were men in training in England for the aviation corps, several thousand of whom sailed from Liverpool on the liners Lapland and Minnehaha on November 22. The march of these men from camp to landing stage was a continuous ovation. It was announced in Washington that the sick and convalescent would be returned from France first and that they would be followed by the divisions which had seen the hardest service and by men sent over for special work now required. General Pershing will retain about 1,200,000 men for the arm of occupation.

PRESIDENT VOTES "DRY." President Wilson, on November 21, signed the Emergency Agricultural Appropriation Bill under a provision of which the nation will be made dry July 1, 1919, to so remain until the last regiment of expeditionary force is mustered out. This measure won after a long fight in the Senate, a fight which sulted in the inquiry to find out the mysteries of the operations of the Brewster through their paid agents and subsidized press. Though this bill will make the nation absolutely dry it will really affect only the making of wines, for whiskey has been made since the first necessity was recognized for the conservation of foodstuffs and making of beer was stopped by the President's proclamation on December 1. There is at this writing no evidence to indicate any intention to permit the breweries or distilleries to resume, but they are given a further lease of life the bill will stop them again on May 1, 1919.

The salon in Ambassador Sharp's home, in the American Embassy in Paris, where President Wilson may hold world memorable conferences the suggestion that his return would depend upon the time of settlement of the main questions to come before the conferences. It was suggested that there might be two treaties. One outlining the main essentials of the world settlement, to be completed during the President's stay abroad, the other dealing with the elaborate details of adjustment and application, to be worked out by delegates during the months to follow the signing of the primary document.

Versailles, although not definitely announced as the scene of this gathering which is to set the boundaries of the world, perhaps for all the future, was reported as getting ready for the conference, and every indication pointed to the palace where Germany humbled France as the scene of Germany's penance.

A Week in the World's News

SECRETARY McADOO RESIGNS. Because of the depletion of his personal fortune by the excess of the cost of living above the salary of a cabinet officer and in order to recoup his finances and provide for his family, Secretary of the Treasury Wm. G. McAdoo sent to the President on November 14 a letter resigning his office as Secretary of the Treasury, to take effect on the qualification of his successor and his office as Director General of Railroads to take effect January 1. The President accepted both resignations, reluctantly, on November 21, and the letters were made public on the day following. The salary of a cabinet officer is $12,000 a year. Mr. McAdoo had received no additional compensation for his services as Director General of

It was intimated that Mr. McAdoo would resume the practice of law in New York.

SMALL CHANGE FOR THE KAISER. Amsterdam dispatches of November 18 reported the arrival in Holland in a sealed wagon from Germany of 200 sacks each containing one hundredweight of gold or coin, somewhere in the neighborhood of $3,800,000, all consigned to the former Kaiser. Other advices told of communications maintained with Germany by the former ruler by courier and airplane and of the establishment of a wireless station on the castle in which he is a guest. The claim has been made by several papers in Germany that the failure to publish the formal notice of abdication indicated that Wilhelm had not abdicated, and London was reported also to regard him as still a sovereign at war with England. He is said to be keeping an ear to the ground waiting to be recalled by his faithful people and this possible contingency is not being disregarded by the Allies.

AMERICA'S HONOR ROLL. Owing to delays due to congestion of the cables the American casualty lists being received from General Pershing did not indicate the true totals of killed and injured in the American Expeditionary Force on the dates they were given out in Washington. General March was quoted about November 20 as estimating that the total of all casualties would not greatly exceed 100,000. On November 23, however, General Pershing cabled the final figures, which showed that the total casualties were 236,117, divided as follows: Killed or died of wounds 36,154, died of disease 14,811, deaths unclassified 2,204, wounded 179,625, prisoners 2,163, missing 1,160. The great and rather surprising difference between the estimates and the actual total is accounted for by the delay in transmission and by the terrible fighting through the Argonne and northward to Sedan, which began September 26 and which was the final stroke that pierced ORGANIZING ORDER IN GERMANY. Just before he gave up his office as Imperial Chancellor, Prince Max of Baden issued an appeal to the German people in which he declared that it would be a shame if the former enemies of Germany were obliged to organize a constituent assembly in order to secure a legally established government with which to deal. He urged the People's Government to surrender this initiative and assured of the support of all Germans animated by liberal principles. The People's Government immediately set about the task of providing a truly representative government for Germany. It was announced on November 18 that electoral lists for voting for members of a constituent assembly would be completed January 2 and that the plan provided for elections on February 2. A cablegram from a special correspondent of the New York Times, sent from Berlin on November 16, declared that the revolution in Berlin had been almost bloodless, that the "Berliners went to bed to a painful degree in an absolute anarchy and when they awoke the next morning found themselves in the most radical Republic." He reported all classes putting their shoulders to the wheel in the effort to justify the former German comprehension of the world to the hard facts of present conditions. According to this correspondent the revolution was accepted, business was being resumed as before and the Social Democratic party of which Chancellor Ebert is a member, is making good and gaining the confidence of the people, while the extreme radical elements were finding it impossible to make headway. Various councils representing different elements of society were being formed among the bourgeoisie and proletariat. The Ebert government had advised the Bolshevik government of Russia that representatives must be sent to Germany, the principal fear for the present in Germany being the triumph of Bolshevism. Chancellor Ebert announced on November 17 that the new government would in no way impair the legitimacy of war loans, and that salaries, pensions and other claims on the state of soldiers and their dependents would remain valid. He declared any intention to seize banks or property, he announced that large incomes and great fortunes must pay their share of expense.

Berlin dispatches of November 20 reported that the People's Commissioners, of which Herr Ebert is the head, had come into collision with the Executive Committee of the Soldiers' and Workmen's Council, an executive committee claiming the supreme power and seeking to have the commissions

The Times Are in His Hand

THESE are vital days. The world is in flux. Men's minds search the ages for light that will unveil the future. History fails, philosophy is impotent, but God gave the key to events to his prophets and these hid the key in His Book. On November 25-26-27-28 there was held in New York a Conference of students of prophecy. Next week we will give you a complete report of this conference, its spirit, its purport, its personalities and its messages.

This week we have something particular to say on pages 1355 to 1358. Just turn to the rotogravure section and read it all. Then invite your best friend to join the family, better still send him the Christian Herald for Christmas.

The church of today will become the church of tomorrow. Rev. W. A. Hutchinson next week brings to the Christian Herald pulpit the vision of "The Church in the New Age."

Next week also more pictures in rotogravure, a story of evangelism in the heroic Belgian army which now tastes victory, a short sojourn in Marion Harland's Comfort Corner, and a few more things for good measure.

Japanese children in America playing American games at a real American picnic

Japanese Students in Sunny California

THERE are fifteen thousand Japanese here in Southern California, ten thousand in Los Angeles. These are not coolies, but young men from the middle and upper classes who have come to "learn," and while learning are willing to do anything that they can find to do. They go rapidly from one position to another, that they may learn all kinds of work while they are studying books. We find them as "bell-boys," running elevators, as "house-boys" in private families.

Japanese employment agencies receive these "boys" as they come from Japan eager for an American education. Each is carefully coached by one who has been out to service. After a few weeks of such coaching he is ready to take a place as "house-boy," doing all work after school.

These Japanese are eager students and go on from high school to university.

Nature-lovers, artists by birth, they are naturally absorbing the florist business, starting with a flower-stand made of a dry-goods box between two buildings, thence rapidly advancing to a piano box, to a small room, and to greenhouses that cover an acre or more. In one Japanese greenhouse we found six long buildings with 30,000 carnation plants. In other well-kept houses were sweet peas, freesias, or chrysanthemums.

They take kindly to American ways, although the women miss the heavy floor mats and the large vacant rooms of their Oriental homes. They find the outdoor gardening arduous. The children are proud of the fact that they are American citizens if their fathers are not. The fathers recognize this added privilege of their children and try to educate them for it. They built and equipped a large school on near their thousands of acres leased for market gardens and presented it to the city ready for use if the city would pay teachers to "keep school there." They have bought an automobile and pay a chauffeur to go out among these garden each morning and pick up the kindergarten children and take them to school, returning them to their mothers at noon.

While some still retain their native religions, many attend the various mission schools of the city and they have a large undenominational church and school of their own, with a native pastor, teachers and officers.

They have the only Japanese Humane Society in the world. It is under the control of the Japanese consul. It has a $4,000 plant in Inglewood with several acres of ground, enough for playground and gardens. The secretary wears a policeman's badge and has the authority to act in all matters Japanese.

Each year they have one or more picnics to which all Japanese are invited. Besides their national games, they enjoy some American ones. They always have a salute to the flag by the school children and the singing of America.

Teachers and officers of the Japanese Sunday school

"JUST seventeen pennies, Miriam! Lot's not wait for any more. Let's go on a candy bat this recess!"

Madge, the livelier of the Rossiter twins, snatched the pin-tray out of her sister's hand so quickly that the pennies flew out of the impromptu bank and rolled all over the bedroom floor. Both girls scrambled after them, but Miriam rose to her knees after a moment's search.

"Madge, do you suppose it's all right?"

"Of course it's all right!" Madge's vehemence showed that the idea had been hers. "Dad hasn't brought any candy home for months, and I'm starved. It's our own allowance."

"But it's almost a quarter."

Seventeen Cents and a Human Life

"What if it is? Your Thrift Stamp card's full, and so's mine, and we've each got more than any girl in the freshman class. I guess we can treat ourselves to seventeen cents. Stingy Gabel!" she taunted.

"Maybe—well I'll go, but——"

"No 'buts' about it." Madge's positiveness increased with the tucking of the last penny into her purse.

THE last period before recess came the weekly spelling-match in English class. The last four Fridays Madge Rossiter and Gabriel Shaterian had tied for first place; who would win today? Gabriel was a handsome Armenian boy who till lately had always held front rank in his studies and yet had had time to be tremendously popular outside school. But the last few weeks something had come over him. In class he missed on such easy questions. Outside he was a "clam." He stayed by himself, he was always missing at recess when their special set made up a table downstairs in the school lunch-room, and he never went anywhere in the evening. If there was anything on his mind, reasoned the boys, why didn't he get it off his chest and tell somebody, instead of looking like a thunder-cloud if a fellow wanted him to spend a nickel? "Stingy Gabe" was his nickname now; if it hurt, nobody knew it.

The last five minutes of the match

Morrill had prepared a special list of words to test the winners. At the financial term, Gabriel's brow grew dark but he spelled it, the next and the next, but the fatal fourth was the word "seventeen."

"S-a-v-e," he began, turned dead white, took his seat and dropped his face on his outstretched arms.

Madge spelled it triumphantly, her fingers on the heavy bunch of pennies in the pocket of her sailor-suit. "Stingy Gaby!" He wouldn't be so enough to spend the whole seventeen. This month's championship was his.

When the bell rang, Madge and Miriam came over to Gabriel's desk.

His Life Given for the Children

How Missionary Oberg Became the "Father" of More Than 1,000 Little Chinese Outcasts

THE Samiao Orphanage work of the Swedish Alliance Mission at Saratsi, West Shansi, China, is a work of faith and love among the "little ones"—a work commenced and carried forward, trusting in God. And the trust has not been in vain.

The devastation caused by the flooding of the Hwangho and other rivers in China is something too terrible to be described. The cause of these floods is that the river-embankments give way, and in consequence a rushing torrent sweeps over fields and villages, destroying everything in its path. Everything is overwhelmed by the approaching flood. Even the love of parents for their children seems to grow cold, as they abandon them in the hopeless confusion. There are two all important things to be done: first, to send laborers to repair the embankments; second, to give all the assistance in our power to those who are suffering by the flood.

It was to work among destitute children that the two devoted missionaries, Mr. and Mrs. Oberg, were unexpectedly called, after their return in 1903, to the district where they had been miraculously delivered in 1900 from the power of the Boxers. Before 1900 there was an orphanage here in connection with the Christian and Missionary Alliance. Miss Clara Hall, in charge of the work, was killed by the Boxers, also her assistant, Kristina Orn. Several of the orphans died of neglect during the Boxer troubles, only ten remaining alive. At the Annual Conference in 1903 these ten orphans were committed to the care of Mr. and Mrs. Oberg.

After their arrival at Saratsi in the autumn of the same year, they took charge of the children; but at that time they had no intention of starting an orphanage, as they had only a small balance remaining from the Famine Relief Funds. On this account they were unable to receive several little children who were brought to them about this time. But presently they began to believe that the Lord might desire to use them as instruments in His work of mercy in saving these destitute and suffering children.

On March 19, 1904, a beggar woman brought them a child, whose despairing mother had recently killed two of her children. She was trying to drown even this last one, but taking pity on the little girl she gave her to this beggar woman. Just as the woman entered our compound, the mail brought a letter from New York containing ten dollars, gold, from an unknown friend. The money was to be used "where the need was greatest," and who was in greater need of it than the little child waiting outside our doors? Three children had already been denied help; but this time it was clear to us that God had sent us the means of support for this child.

So the little girl was taken in and we named her "Chin-ieh-tsi" (or Gold-leaf), because of the gold dollars. After some time, another homeless child came to the Orphanage, and this time also the mail—which comes every fourth day—brought a promise for support, as with the other child. Once again we were led, as by a miracle, to reach out the hand of love to this forsaken child without hesitation.

Since that time, nearly a thousand little outcasts have been received and cared for at the Orphanage. These poor, destitute children, who have been denied the love and care of father and mother as well as the light and joy of real home-life, have become the recipients of the Christian love and care of the missionaries, who hope to win many of the precious young souls for Christ. The children at the Orphanage receive a Christian education, as well as provision for their temporal needs, and it is hoped that they will become witnesses for the Lord among their own people.

I could relate many instances showing how wonderfully God's people have responded to His promptings by extending to us the aid necessary for this rescue work. One of the most remarkable was undoubtedly a note from Rev. G. W. Clarke of Tientsin several years ago, which announced: "I have brought good news for you. The Christian Herald has promised to support 100 orphans for five years." This good news thrilled our hearts with joy and thankfulness. What the faithful fulfilment of this promise has done for the Samiao Orphanage, God knows best, and He will surely bless the Christian Herald and all the dear friends co-operating with it in this work of love.

The five years have long since elapsed, but we are still recipients of a considerable allowance from friends in connection with this charitable paper. There are, however, forty-two children still on our list for whom we are receiving only quarter-support. Our children are supported by special patrons, who take a keen and loving interest in them. They are often gladdened by loving letters, books, cards, toys and valuable presents, and even extra checks occasionally find their way to inland China, where this rescue work of ours goes on. Children not being fortunate in having patrons in America, seeing these cards, presents and beautiful things that others receive, feel sorely the lack, and sometimes their feelings find expression in words like these: "I want a foreign friend, too."

In a large sense, the support of the work rests on the sure foundation of the Lord's readiness and ability to provide. When Mr. Oberg, the founder of the Orphanage, passed away in the beginning of this year, we felt as though darkness itself hung around us. We would hardly perceive a ray of light. Twelve days later, death appeared again,— this time taking away the beloved nurse, Miss Nordstrom. Outside the Mission compound an epidemic was raging and carrying people away by scores and hundreds. It was the pneumonic plague. We had succeeded, so far, by closing the gates, in keeping the plague out; but death has other servants as well, and by two of these he took our beloved ones.

We felt in our great sorrow as if we could not endure another day; but the days sped quickly, each day bringing tokens of our Heavenly Father's care and remembrance. Little hearts were again warmed by love and life, and the dark clouds were lined with silver.

Over six months passed. The 14th of August was the day set apart in memory of Mr. Oberg—who was called "Father" by nearly five hundred children. Not only the children went out to the cemetery that day, but the whole church joined and paid their respects to "Father" Oberg. They had prepared silken standards and inscribed upon them golden characters of love and remembrance.

A tribute to Mr. Oberg, written by the Christians in Chinese, was read by Evangelist Kia. It told of his birth in Vermland, Sweden, January 16, 1869; of his longing for the Lord's work even from his childhood, his coming to China at 27, in 1896, and his subsequent missionary career and death; also, how he had opened industrial schools, engaged teachers to teach our boys to make woolen mats and rugs, and to weave cloth and ribbons, the profits of which were used for the maintenance of the orphanage work. It also set forth how at New Year, 1916, he warded off a great calamity from the city, which robbers had threatened to burn, and how he lived among the people as a peacemaker.

An essential part of the silver lining on the cloud of sorrow is that Mother Oberg is still among her rescued little ones.

We are hoping that the Christian Herald friends, who have done so much for this work in the past, will again become interested sufficiently to help us in our labors among the little ones and our efforts to meet the needs of the children of the Orphanage. Any gifts sent to that journal in our behalf will be gratefully acknowledged.

EMIL JOHNSON.

The Suffering in Syria

DR. JOHN H. FINLEY, of the Palestine Relief Commission of the Red Cross, who left last March and who returned on November 5, cabled just before leaving Palestine as follows:

"Just returned from tour through Palestine and lower Syria, passing through Nazareth, Tiberias, Tyre, Sidon, Haifa. Reached Beirut two days after occupation. Dr. Ward (of the Syrian Protestant College, another member of the expedition) and I were welcomed by Beirut College, where we attended the assembly at the opening of the college year.

"President Bliss and all American members of the community well. Great enthusiasm over Allies, with prospect of better service than ever for college. Beirut and Syria in general now open for freer relief, desperately needed. One-third of Lebanon population has died of starvation and diseases due to lack of adequate food.

In spite of all that could be done to relieve distress, the sufferings of the poor have been extreme. Missionary letters state that a large proportion of the inhabitants of Beirut and Lebanon, perhaps one-fourth or even more, have died of famine and typhus. It is difficult to resist the conclusion that the Turks deliberately intended to starve this region, which contained an unusually large Christian population. It is true that a number of soup kitchens where the poor of all sects could obtain a little food were opened by the government, but they were entirely inadequate to meet the situation. While the people of Beirut and Lebanon were starving, it is said that there were large stores of grain at Damascus, Hama and Aleppo, and this grain was only brought to Beirut and the Lebanon in dribblets, most of it being kept for the army.

Will the Church Be Ready?

WHEN the first shock of war struck the nations, they were temporarily stunned. They did not dream that the conflagration could spread so swiftly as it did. It took time to realize the magnitude of the disaster. Now, the sudden cessation of the war has produced another shock, although of a wholly different character. It is as though the hand of Omnipotence had reached down and touched the frenzied world, and a voice had commanded, "Peace, be still!" Even yet, the fact that the great struggle is indeed ended is not fully realized.

Many years ago Mazzini foresaw, in the growing desire of the peoples, the need of "a fellowship of nations sternly restraining the ambitions of an exclusive patriotism, and a real acknowledgment of the lordship of Jesus, who positively laid the basis of universal brotherhood in his dealings with mankind." The furnace test through which the world has just passed has made an indelible impression upon the spiritual life of the nations. So distinguished an authority as Bishop Gore of Oxford made this the theme, during his recent visit, of his addresses in more than twenty American cities. He expressed the hope that it would lead to unity on the spiritual plane among the free nations of the earth. The Christian Herald has already called attention to his stirring message, and at this time, when the subject of unity is being discussed in all the denominations, it is well to keep it steadily in view and clearly to apprehend its scope and meaning.

In a recent address on "The Program of the Church at the Present Time," delivered by Dr. Henry Churchill King, the following passages occur:

The issues of this war are to an unprecedented degree moral and finally religious, and they call, therefore, preeminently for the rallying of all our spiritual forces. What has been happening is that little by little men have been sloughing off all un-Christlike types of Christianity. The Christianity that we must preserve is not to be shallow and it is not to be sentimental. It is not primarily emotional. It is not primarily theological. It is not primarily ceremonial. All these types of Christianity have been proved wanting. With all of them it has been found possible to harmonize at the same time a hatred and bitterness utterly un-Christlike. All these have failed. The only Christianity that can be said to have come out of this conflict unscathed is the Christianity of Christ himself, ethical through and through, applicable to all men and to all classes, and to nations as well as to individuals, free, utterly free from hatred and bitterness and from all arrogance. . . . This is no time, therefore, for the forces of righteousness to indulge in divisive differences. They must get together and work together. . . . There ought to be a comprehensive, clear-sighted, large-minded social program, back of which the whole reunited Church shall align itself, to make sure that something worthy of the sacrifices that have gone into this war should come to pass.

There was a time during the stormiest part of the war when the very foundations of democracy throughout the world were shaken and seemed to be threatened with collapse. In those dark days men realized as never before the meaning of the Bible truth that God had made of one blood all the nations of the earth, and they saw that the principle contained in that statement was the very bedrock of democracy. Now that the struggle is past, and that peace must be made enduringly secure against future assaults, men everywhere are becoming convinced that this can only be done by going back to the foundation of the faith, which is the Gospel of Jesus Christ. That Gospel alone can establish and perpetuate the principles of the League of Nations—justice and the rights of the weak against the strong. How important, then, it is that this vital principle should have appropriate representation!

This conviction is growing common among all classes, not only among the men in the trenches, but among those at home. It has been well expressed in these burning sentences in a sermon by Rev. A. E. Bartlett of Brooklyn:

These upheavals, these losses, these burdens, these separations, these sacrifices, these deepening loves, these glorious visions are causing men to be born again. They are being born out of the old, the narrow, the conventional, limited life, into one of breadth and vision and service. Men in the trenches, coming together out of different sections, from different tasks, but with one common purpose, are being born again as they stand knee-deep in the trenches or seek the rest that comes after standing on the first step or going over the top. They will come back different men.

This is no overdrawn picture. The men know it, the chaplains know it, the Gospel workers know it, and the churches at home know it, or ought to know it. The task for which the Church is now girding itself is to meet this new situation. It is to prepare for the union of all the spiritual forces at its command to meet it. Not a union which will be destructive of the identity of any of the parts of the Church, but which shall weld the whole together for the promotion of spiritual unity, so that all the denominations may be able to act unitedly, in every field of Christian effort, including those that have to deal with the moral and social questions of the day. Beginning by burning their home fences—for the time for petty divisions has passed—let them get together for such cooperative efficiency as is indispensable to meet the new situation.

In many quarters we hear the phrase that "sectarianism has been wiped out by the war." While this may be true in a measure, yet it is only true as far as it relates to the differences that are trivial and dispensable. It is an effacement that will strengthen, rather than weaken, the churches. It will substitute friendly cooperation for needless rivalry, and it will help in a thousand ways to make the churches stronger and more efficient in meeting the needs of the multitudes who will throng them when our men come back, as they are already beginning to come. Soon they will be with us again by the thousands and tens of thousands. Will we be ready for them with the right welcome?

The President and the Conference

WE do not share the misgivings entertained by some of our neighbors concerning President Wilson's plan to attend the opening of the Peace Conference. He may finally decide not to go; but if he does, surely there is no one better qualified to sit at the Peace Table, and certainly none who has contributed to the triumph of peace principles more than our good President himself has done. Nor would any one be surer of a hearty welcome from all the Allied peoples and their representatives. While it may be conceded that his proposed visit is a violation of precedent, even that need not weigh very heavily with us, since at every phase of the war we have witnessed the spectacle of demolished precedents to right and left. The truth is, the war has set a new angle on everything. Besides, it should not be forgotten that there is no constitutional or legislative provision standing in the way of the proposed visit.

When he does go, it will not be to act as umpire or referee, mentor or dictator. All the suggestions on these lines that are made by the political journals are gratuitous. If Woodrow Wilson goes to the Peace Conference, he will go as the representative of the American people, to impress upon the Conference the views of this Government as to the basis of world peace—views which have been submitted to and approved of by Congress. It is entirely unnecessary to assume that he could go in any other capacity.

Before leaving for France, the President will probably outline to Congress the purpose of his visit, and he may even indicate the points he desires to make in any address he may deliver before the Conference. It is intimated in certain quarters that he may be called upon to preside at the opening session. However, all that is mere speculation. The fact of his attendance alone is of importance. And it may be taken for granted that any expressions he may make will be in line with the principles he has laid down in his various addresses before Congress.

We may well imagine that the Peace Conference will be a historic setting worthy of the close of the great drama of the last four years. Preparations are under way in Paris to have the entire affair distinctly memorable, as befits a gathering which has to decide the terms for preserving the world's peace hereafter. Great Britain, France, Italy, Bulgaria, Serbia, Greece, Japan, China, Rumania, the United States, and possibly some of the South American republics, will be all represented. Nothing can be stated definitely as to representation for the neutrals, although their recognition is by no means improbable. It may even come to pass that labor, which has played such a prominent part throughout the whole war, will be represented. We should be glad to learn that representation has also been accorded to the great religious bodies, since the moral and spiritual aims of the war have been well defined, and the influence of the Christian Church has been such a potent factor throughout the struggle. We believe that the Peace Conference will furnish the grandest opportunity the world has ever witnessed for authoritative international recognition of the divine sovereignty, in a gathering which Lloyd George has fitly characterized as "a conference upon whose action the destiny of the civilization of the next five hundred years may depend." What is more fitting than that the Conference should acknowledge the divine goodness in giving the fruits of victory to the cause of righteousness and justice for all the peoples engaged in the struggle?

Third Bible Picture Study

RAPID progress has been made in our Third Bible Picture Study, and we expect shortly to be able to announce the prize winners. About 50,000 sets of Answers were enrolled, each participant submitting an average of four answers for all of the thirty pictures. The work involved in examining these six million answers, to compile the different answers submitted for each picture required a great deal more time than we expected. The different answers for each picture are in the hands of the Judges for consideration and are expected very soon. It will require only a short time after they announce their decision to determine the prize winners.

The Family Circle Sits Around

HOW we used to sit uneasily on the edge of our chairs and peer covertly through the half-opened door from which came the distracting incense of savory viands, as we awaited the call of the dinner gong on those holidays, rich in memory, which punctuated with pleasure the glowing years of youth! We may grow up, but we never lose our joy in anticipation.

It is for this reason that the Christian Herald publishes once a year a forecast of the good things we are to serve to our Family Circle in the year to come. The editors, like the cook in the kitchen putting the dinner in order, feel a double joy, the joy of doing and the joy of sharing later in the good things taking shape under their hands. But this is no selfish exultation; they know that you who read the Christian Herald will crowd the table when the feast is spread, and so about this time they send a ringing summons to you all.

On pages 1355 to 1358 of this issue you will find, set in order and ready, a small part of the banquet which will be served in weekly courses during the year to come. Just as at grandmother's the dinner far exceeded its savory promise, so nineteen-nineteen will bring all the good things we outline in these pages and many more. The future has much in store that is not yet revealed, even to the editors. All that we promise will be yours and more. God all these years has led the Christian Herald and is leading it still in ways of service where all its members can serve him.

In addition to the menu of good things for the coming year, we have the pleasure to serve you also with books which are of more than passing value. These will make your own library more complete, and will enable you to make most acceptable holiday gifts to those close and intimate friends whose good taste and whose standing in your regard require gifts most carefully chosen.

To Make the Whole World Dry

WORLD-WIDE prohibition is the purpose of a conference held at Columbus, Ohio, November 19-22, with delegates present from all states in the Union and from several foreign countries. At this conference provision was made for carrying to every civilized nation on earth the methods and means by which the Anti-Saloon League has done such effective work in America.

At the convention of the League in Indianapolis in 1916, a resolution was adopted calling for such a conference, to be held at the end of the war. In attendance, enthusiasm and practical results it has exceeded expectation. Canada, Mexico and the British Isles are the foreign countries that were most largely represented. A number of men across the water had been invited, but the termination of the war put problems upon them which precluded their attendance. Some of them sent greetings.

Speakers at the conference were representatives of a number of lines of interest and activity. The Church was on the program, and there were cabinet members, governors, college presidents, manufacturers and officials of the League.

As a result of the Columbus conference, branch publishing houses and headquarters of the Anti-Saloon League will be established in many of the world's capitals, and League men will go abroad soon to arrange for such houses, and for cooperation with resident organizations that are lined up with the movement. The program will be to fit America's methods and League programs to the work of reforming other countries just as far as they can be made to fit.

Autograph Copy of Keats

IN one of the book sales in an American city the other day was bought a copy of the first edition of John Keats's "Endymion," published in London in 1818, with an autograph inscription on the title page in the handwriting of the author. The inscription by John Keats reads: "Thomas Keats to his friend William Haslam, 1818." The inscription is rich with sentiment. As the vase of alabaster retained its sweet odor for a hundred years, so this inscription exhales the fragrance of a brother's love of a hundred years ago just as distinctly now as when it was written. Thomas Keats, the youngest of the three brothers, took consumption when eighteen years of age, and the poet changed his plans so that he might nurse his brother, whom he loved better than his life. Toward the last William Haslam, a dear friend, gave up his time to help care for the afflicted one. Thomas lingered about a year, and then died. And it is likely that John sent this volume with the inscription to Haslam just after this brother's death in 1818. The volume itself, "Endymion," with his other books, is a censer whose fragrant incense has perfumed the best literature and sentiment of the world for a hundred years. Keats was a genuine poet. His fondness for the beautiful was inborn, and a burning passion. It was natural that he should take Greek names for his masterpieces. Endymion, the book recently bought, was named after a Greek youth of surpassing beauty, hunter, shepherd, or king of Elis, whom Zeus made immortal by throwing him into an eternal slumber. Another masterpiece he called "Hyperion," the sun-god, incarnation of light and beauty among the Greeks. Keats's father apprenticed him at fifteen to a surgeon, but he was a poet, broke his professional cage and flew on the wings of song into the upper ranges of beauty, truth and love. He was only allowed three years of this flight. Consumption put its hand on him, and in a year's time took him away at twenty-six. But his verses are immortal. Tennyson, Rossetti, and others drew beauty from them as from an inexhaustible spring. In them they found the sculptor's sense of form, the painter's dream of color and the musician's ecstasy of sound. He is a beautiful youth like Endymion, immortal and asleep. In his love for his brother and gratitude to his friend expressed in this inscription and in his immortal verses "he being dead yet speaketh." (Heb. 11:4.)

Teachers Pick Cotton

IT is the opinion of Professor W. B. Crumpton, superintendent of the Rock Ridge Farm Life School, Wilson, N. C., that Governor Bickett and his Cotton-Picking Kiddos set a good example for the state at large when they went into the fields to save the products of the tillers of the soil who were stricken down with influenza. But the professor says that he and his efficient corps of teachers and their 190 charges beat the governor and his "picked pickers" to it by at least one week. The 190 children went to their respective homes every day at one o'clock and did their duty as they saw it—and did it with cheerfulness. Miss Nannie Hart, of Mooresville, help themselves. And this was not all that these good women did. They went to the homes of the sick and tidied up things, cooked and looked after other household needs, administered medicines and cared for the sick. These industrious women diplomats and philanthropists, died from a stroke of paralysis recently, and on the Thursday following he was buried from Sage Chapel, Cornell University, on what would have been his eighty-sixth birthday. Dr. White served twice as representative of the United States in Germany, once as minister, once again after the legation had been raised to the rank of an embassy, and once as minister to Russia. He was a son of Horace White, who made a fortune in the early days of railroads, and easy financial circumstances gave him the opportunity to devote his life to science, literature and the public good. Young White studied at Hobart and Yale Colleges and abroad at the Sorbonne, the College de France and the University of Berlin, and then went to Petrograd as an attaché of the American legation, serving during the Crimean war. He then took the professorship of history and literature at the University of Michigan. On the death of his father he returned to New York State, where he took an active part in politics as a Republican, being a state senator from 1856 to 1867. He enlisted a wealthy and benevolent man by the name of Cornell in the foundation of a new university at Ithaca, N. Y. Cornell gave $500,000 for the purpose and Dr. White himself gave $300,000. These men called the University "Cornell" and Dr. White became its first president, a position which he filled with singular ability, success and honor for eighteen years. In his autobiography, written at seventy-three, Dr. White says the part he took in founding Cornell was the most important work of his life. Dr. White sought wisdom, not wealth, and fulfilled this promise: "Exalt her, and she shall promote thee; she shall bring to thee honor, when thou dost embrace her." (Prov. 4:8.)

Honey Crop for 1918

THE Agricultural Department at Washington estimates that the crop of honey for this year will be 250,000,000 pounds, an average of two and a half pounds for every man, woman and child in this country, which is a glorious showing in these times when sweets are in such demand. The busy little bees carried from the flowers to the hives 150,000 tons of material besides the honey they had to consume for their own support. About half of this nectar they took from the white clover, the rest from the bloom of the alfalfa, the red clover, the cotton, the basswood, the tulip, the buckwheat, the goldenrod, the mountain sage and other plants. In most of the crops the farmer has a tremendous amount of hard work in plowing, harrowing, planting, cultivating and harvesting. In the great honey crop of the year the farmer has had very little of the work to do. Honey, which was an article of diet among the Jews, was counted by them as a luxury. The Psalmist thus uses it as a symbol of spiritual treasures: "More to be desired are they than gold, sweeter also than honey and the honey-comb." (Ps. 19:10.)

Glorious Celebrations of Peace

KINGS and parliaments, presidents and congresses, participated in formal exercises in celebration of the armistice which is the harbinger of peace, but the people of the world set the pace with the ringing of bells, the firing of guns, the parading of streets, the carrying of banners, the shouts of the multitudes, and the playing of bands. In our country, as in others, the deepest religious enthusiasm as well as the warmest patriotism was manifested in thanksgiving services held by people of all faiths. The celebration in New York City was typical of those held everywhere. The streams of people with cow-bells, horns, feather ticklers, rattlers, torpedoes and supremely happy faces were trying hard to make as much noise as those in the vehicles. Why should not our families go wild with rejoicing that their boys are coming home, and that the cause to which they dedicated their lives is victorious? A vast multitude of the young men of Europe are dead, killed in this war. Some of our dear boys are dead, glorious martyrs, but most are coming back home. Pandora did not know the jar contained all the evils that afflict the earth when she took the lid off. She did it through curiosity.

But the Kaiser knew what was in the box, and deliberately took off the lid and turned loose the blackest demons, falsehood, theft, murder, to give the human heart the deepest sting it ever had, and to drench the earth with the deepest rivers of blood that ever flowed. The heart and conscience of the world arose and smote these diabolical spirits and made them bite the dust, and Foch with his sword conquering on the field, and his voice sounding the death-knell of autocracy, the mother of these evil spirits, took hope out of the jar and declared the peace which is the dawn of a brighter day to this old world, one of universal democracy and everlasting peace. The 11th of November was the greatest day the world ever saw, with the exception of one, the one on which the Prince of Peace was born. The earth did not take much part in the celebration of the peace proclamation that day, but heaven did. It sent angels from the White Throne to serenade the new-born Prince. And the peace celebration of November 11 was an echo to the chorus of the angels who sang: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." (Luke 2:14.)

principal of the school; Miss Mary Parker, of Aulander, teacher of history; Miss Bessie Stanton, of Rowland, teacher of science; Miss Gertrude Cook, of Winston-Salem, teacher of second and third grades; Miss Georgia Lilly, of Norwood, assistant principal, and Miss Mary Ida, of Missouri, teacher of domestic science, all went to the fields and pulled out the locks of King Cotton to the amount of between five and six bales for those who were not able to call to mind the woman of olden times of whom it was said: "She layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff. She stretcheth out her hand to the poor; yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy." (Prov. 31:19, 20.)

A CHRISTIAN WALK

A SERMON

By
REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXTS.—Eph. 5: 2. "Walk in love."
—Eph. 5: 8. "Walk as children of light."
—Eph. 5: 15. "Look carefully how ye walk."

THERE are characteristic walks. We may sometimes tell the occupation of a man from his gait. There is the firm and springy and masculine step of the soldier. There is the somewhat ungainly and yet alluring walk of the sailor. There is the stately walk of the born prince. We are told that there was a certain imperial dignity about the carriage of the peasant Robert Burns as he moved in Scotland's fairest halls. And concerning the Christian, there is in his perpetual habits a characteristic manner of going. There is a peculiar carriage and behavior. As he moves down the streets of time there are certain marks which distinguish him from the ordinary crowd. And in the words which I have taken for exposition the apostle names to us some of these characteristics. He is distinguished by love, and light, and circumspection. There is about him a certain disposition of heart, a certain sunny purity of love, a certain vigilant exactness.

"Walk in love." Now let us see the setting of this. A piece of counsel is often burdensome and depressing, because we ignore its context. If I confine myself merely to the apostle's words which I have just quoted, it seems as though he were laying upon me the duty of creating a fountain, and that a fountain of love; and the counsel depresses and disheartens me. Is it within my power to be a creator of love? Is it within my province to set fountains in motion? One thing in God's Word is perfectly clear, we are never called upon to create fountains. Our duty is to direct the flow of rivers. "All my springs are in thee." Therefore if I am in any way discouraged by the counsel of the text, let me look into the context if perchance I may behold the springs.

What is it that precedes my text? This welcome word, "as beloved children." What is it that succeeds my text? "As Christ also loved you." The very setting of the words is suggestive of an evangel; the river is born out of these two springs. I am able to walk in love because I am myself beloved. We are every one beset and engirt with divine affectional energy. We too often dismiss love as a sentiment, and by sentiment we mean something more ineffective than the colored vapor of the rainbow. It is because we so frequently interpret love as an idle and passive feeling that we so utterly misconceive the grandeur of the Gospel of love. Real love is an energy, as individual in its characteristics as electricity or air. It is a power as real in the spiritual realm as any of the forces which move in the realm of matter. "God loves me."

That means infinitely more than that God is well disposed toward me. It far exceeds the hospitality of an open door. It is an outgoing, friendly, affectionate force. It is a veritable ally moving round about my life, hungering to serve me.

NOW it is part of our wonderful endowment that we can resist and repel this divine energy of love. I go out in the early morning when the air is sweet, and soft, and clear, and is working in manifold ways the miracle of the resurrection. It steals from the open country right up to my house door, yet I can repel it. I can close every window and every crevice, and deny the gracious minister right of entrance. I may be enswathed in electrical force; it may be all about me, yet, if I immure myself in a glass sphere, I can resist its approaches. All I need to do is to erect a non-conductor, and the friendly visitor is paralyzed. And when that heavenly air which we call the love of God moves round about my life intent on a reviving ministry, I can shut it from my life, I can erect a non-conductor. I can rear a prejudice. I can establish the barrier of some selfish purpose. I can set up the obstinacy of a stubborn will. I can keep the heavenly visitor at the door, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock." Or I can let in the heavenly force, as I can open the window and let in the morning air. How can I let in the love of God? Chiefly by thinking about it.

To give thought is to offer hospitality. We entertain the thing that we most contemplate. That thing comes nearest to us which is most prominent in our minds. If I think about the Lord, and about the love of the Lord, if I meditate upon it as it is seen in life and in death, it will steal into my soul as the sweet air steals into the open chamber. And then see what happens. Once admit the energy of the divine love, and all things are subdued unto itself. If I welcome the love of God, God makes of me a lover. Energized by love, I shall walk in love. "As Christ loved me and gave himself for me," so shall I give myself in affectionate service to others.

In this high sphere giving is the rule of living. Because I am beloved I shall find myself able to love. Possessing the fountain I can direct the river.

"WALK as children of light." What a radiant vocabulary is elicited even when we pronounce this beautiful figure! It calls round about it quite a company of shining ones; words, such as cheery, bright, sunny, inspiring optimism! We sometimes say of a little child, "She is the sunshine of the house," and what that little child is in the home, Christians are to be in the long, monotonous streets of the world. We are to be children of light. First of all, is not the figure suggestive of warmth? We are to be like hearth-fires. There are so many things to make the world cold. Bereavement makes one very cold. If death comes into our house, even in the middle of June, the house becomes a very clammy place. Disappointment is also very chilling, and all round about us there are souls that are just frozen in the bonds of calamity, and broken ambition, and bereavement.

I have read that some of the municipal authorities in Canada, during extraordinary severity of weather, made great fires in the streets, that the poor might gather round them and have the frost taken out of their paralyzed limbs. And is not that a figure of what happened in the olden days, when the Christ of God moved amid the streets of man? Was not he like a great hearth-fire, round which the consciously cold gathered for cheer and warmth?

"Then came all the publicans and sinners for to hear him." How beautiful it is that they drew near to the heavenly flame and felt revived! And is not this the promise that is made to Christians, that they too, like their Master, shall be "burning lights"? "He shall baptize you with fire."

The presence of that flame is a splendid argument for religion. Men may mistake our logic and ignore our doctrine, but they will be wooed by our fire. But then the figure is not only suggestive of warmth; it is suggestive of guidance. Men need our light in their perplexities and bewilderments. And don't let us think that we need to be "stars" in order to shine. It was by the ministry of a candle that the woman recovered her lost piece of silver. Perhaps it is the candle people, the one- or two-talent people, who are of most service in this sphere. It is possible to find a diamond by the aid of a match.

I think it is likely that when all things are reckoned up, and the wonderful labors of life are all made known, it will be found that the candle-folk have discharged a wonderful ministry in guiding poor sick, lost pilgrims to the Saviour's feet. We are called upon to be "burning and shining lights," "children of light."

"LOOK carefully how ye walk." Literally interpreted, the apostle seems to say, "Walk with scrupulous exactness; never relax your vigilance; be careful where you put your feet; watch the next step."

Keep thou my feet; I do not ask to see
The distant scene; one step enough for me.

Now it is usually little things that cause us to stumble. I do not fall over a beer-barrel, but I slip over a piece of orange peel. I have never stumbled over a bale of cotton, but if one flag in the pavement projects a third of an inch, I may be brought to grief. I can avoid the bigger thing; I am careless about the trifles. The little things cause me to stumble. "Look carefully how ye walk." Recollect the importance of details. Life is made up of steps and incidents and trifles. "He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much."

Let me add one concluding word. One way to attain unto a fine walk is to hold company with those who possess it. I think I have noticed when a soldier lad has come home and he is met by one or two of his old comrades that as they walk down the street together with the hero in the middle, the two mates unconsciously seek to throw off their slouch and attempt the step and the dignity of their much-drilled and well-disciplined friend. We too, shall strive after a finer carriage if we hold company with our Lord. "Oh for a closer walk with God!"

Rainbows and Glad Music

ALL life's road will bloom with flowers,
And its little silver showers
Will be followed by the wonder of a rainbow
Fair and high. . . .
If you walk with love and laughter,
Joy will follow swiftly after,
Like a shadow dancing under the glad music
Of the sky!

The Blood of the Martyrs

SUNDAY, December 8. Phil. 1:14. "Warring confident by my bonds." That is a consequence which the apostle never expected. His expectations were quite of another kind. He had assumed that his imprisonment meant the end of his active ministry. And now he discovers that his very bonds have become the ministers of spiritual freedom to his fellow believers. And so does it happen that the Lord uses black circumstances to accomplish radiant ends. Surely that is harnessing the enemy to the chariot! Surely that is transforming afflictions into a flail which releases the corn!

And so in Christ Jesus we may always look for surprises from the ministry of our disasters. That is how God is always bringing amazing births out of the most deadly circumstances. Stephen is stoned, and in the hour of the stoning the persecutor, Saul, awakes to spiritual disquietude and begins to grope after the marvelous realities that were unveiled in the apostle of the Lord. And then at a later day Paul himself was stoned at Lystra, and in the stoning young Timothy awakes to the vision of the magnificent strength and glory of a life which is possessed by Jesus Christ. Paul's invincible courage in the midst of the fierce assaults of his enemies won the heart of a young fellow who became the closest comrade of his ministry. It is surely a remarkable ministry of grace how in such seasons of dire antagonism two great souls were started on their journey toward the Lord.

And so may it be in these heavily clouded days of ours. The same Lord is at work. We speak tremblingly of ruin and destruction and disaster. Venerable temples have crumbled into dust, and we sometimes feel spiritually homeless in the desolation. But the Lord is at work, and if we remain faithful to his will he will turn our very sorrows into the exponents of his grace. J. H. J.

The Light of Life

MONDAY, December 9. John 8:12. "He that followeth me shall have the light of life." The meditations of Thomas à Kempis begin with the saying, "He that keepeth my words shall not walk in darkness." That Teutonic monk of the fifteenth century had found the light of life. There is a light of science which we may find by following human teachers. By so much as we get an insight into the world's great movements, we obtain the light of history. There is a light of literature. Blessed are they who get the inner vision of the permanent element in books. Matthew Arnold pleads with us to strive for a knowledge of the best that has been thought and said in all the ages. There are those who find the light of art. John Ruskin has helped multitudes in this direction. Ruskin could see beauty in an old vase, a window casement, a carved column, a moss-grown tower. But one may have the light of science and history, literature and art, and not have the light of life. Knowledge is not life. The light of which Jesus spoke is light on life's problems. Christ is the Light of life because he gives us light on life, its whence and its whither. Perhaps it suits the case better to call it light in life. It is the light of a life. Following him we get light on all phases of life. Moreover, it is a growing light "that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." If we follow the Master, it will dawn upon us some time that this life of ours is but the beginning of a life which time can not impair nor sorrow dim nor death defeat. C. C. A.

Armor and Weapon

TUESDAY, December 10. Eph. 6:16, 17. "Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God." The apostle had started out to describe the panoply, the "whole armor" of Christians in their spiritual warfare. "Above all," that is, covering the pieces mentioned before, is to be the Christian's shield of faith. The shield of a heavy-armed soldier in ancient times was so large that it hid the soldier completely. The javelin hurled against him would be caught by the shield. If the shield was of combustible material, it would be set on fire by fiery darts. When the soldier's shield was gone, he was exposed to the full violence of the attack. The Christian's shield is his faith in Christ and His Word. He has truth and the promises of the Almighty on his side, and therefore he has the evidence of things not seen.

The expression "helmet of salvation," or as Paul also calls it, "the hope of salvation," reminds us that the helmet of an ancient soldier not only afforded protection to the head in a hand-to-hand engagement, but also served as an ornament. On its crest emblematical figures would be placed, such as the emblem of hope, to signify that he who wore it would be prosperous in the engagement and escape unscathed from the encounter. The Christian has for his helmet an unwavering hope of salvation: he is confident that he will succeed in carrying out his Captain's orders, surmount every difficulty, and conquer his enemy. Hence he wears his head erect like a soldier who knows that he has a helmet on his head which no battle-axe can cleave.

The last weapon which the apostle mentions is a weapon of offense; it is the sword of the Spirit, the Word of God. The Epistle to the Hebrews says regarding this Word that it "is quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart." Against the truth of Christ's evangel no error and opposition can prevail. Wielding this sword the Christian will cut a path through the thickest ranks of unbelievers, and force his opponent to cry for quarter. W. H. T. D.

The Voice of God

WEDNESDAY, December 11. II Peter 1:18. "And this voice we heard when we were with Him in the holy mount." If we will listen, we can hear the voice of God, especially if we are with him in the holy mount of prayer and meditation. We ask everything in his name and for his sake who maketh intercession for us. He is our great High Priest, who has passed into the heavens, and who is with us always by the presence of the Holy Spirit. One never forgets the voice of Christ of loving tenderness when He whispers to the soul. How often we have felt it was good to be there, as we saw no man save Jesus only. We knew that it was no fable, no dream, but an everlasting reality. The Star of Bethlehem burst into the Sun of Righteousness on that holy mount. There we found light for darkness, glory for gloom. Ever after that we realized that his sheep know his voice and know not the voice of strangers.

It is not church forms and ceremonies that speak to us most loudly, though they may become the channels through which His loving voice resounds in our hearts. After hearing and seeing him in the mountain vision, everywhere we look we exclaim, "It is the Lord!" This is the life more abundant, full as the abounding waves of the sea. When He walks upon its waters, we hear "It is I; be not afraid." It is good to read about his Bethlehem birth, his Calvary death, his rising from the sepulcher and his ascension into heaven. But oh, to know that he is yours forever, to hear him say, "I know thee, I love thee with an everlasting love," what joy unspeakable and full of glory! His perfect love keeps us in perfect peace while we journey toward the gates of light which will be lifted up for our entrance into his presence ever more. E. W. C.

The Blessedness of Responsibility

THURSDAY, December 12. Rev. 3:12. "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God." The world is weary. The human heart craves rest. Yet this beatitude points to new burdens. It is a beatitude—the beatitude of responsibility. But while it points to new burdens, it also promises new supplies of strength. What is a pillar for? To support a weight, to bear a burden. So the promise is that they who have borne burdens faithfully here shall have more burdens to bear in the life to come! Let us state it otherwise: "Blessed are the faithful, for they shall be entrusted with increased responsibility." The blessedness of purity is in the clear vision it imparts. The blessedness of the soul that hungers and thirsts after righteousness is in its very relish for righteousness. The blessedness of the faithful servant of God is in the very strength his faithfulness has brought to him. Let us reflect how responsibility develops character, and responsibility is only another name for burden-bearing. It teaches us care and caution. It imparts new dignity to our behavior. A private soldier who is made a corporal at once instinctively stands up a bit straighter and walks somewhat more erectly. West Indian women who bear heavy burdens on their heads are marvelously free from curvature of the spine. I know of a newsboy who had often played "craps." But there came a time when he stopped risking pennies on dice. He explained: "I can't gamble any more 'cause I've got a family now." His father had died and the support of the whole family now rested upon him.

It is an old saying, and a wise one, that the reward of work well done is the capacity for more work. Every task fulfilled results in a new increment of strength, and the sum of all our strength measures our reliability. "All the strength of the years that are foregone pour their health into this." C. C. A.

The Lord God of Shem

FRIDAY, December 13. Gen. 9:26. "Blessed be the Lord God of Shem." The state of faith in the Redeemer in the era of the patriarchs is a subject of most profitable study. Glimpses of that faith are afforded us by Eve's joyful exclamation at the birth of her firstborn, by the public preaching of the name of the Lord in the days of Enoch, and by the name which Noah received from his parents. After the flood the prophecy narrows down to a distinct race, that of Shem. Shem is the progenitor of Abraham and the nation of Israel, among which God had set up his theocratic government. To the church of the old covenant the promises were made regarding the future Messiah. Christ declared to the Samaritan woman: "Salvation is of the Jews." Paul declares that from this nation are "the fathers, of whom Christ came as concerning the flesh," and the writer to the Hebrews says: "It is evident that our Lord sprang out of Judah." The Redeemer, to be the true Redeemer, must be a Jew. That is the greatest contribution which the Jewish race has made to the stock of the world's knowledge and the elements of men's happiness: they gave us the Redeemer and the word of salvation. Therefore we say, with Noah: "Blessed be the Lord God of Shem." It is true, Christ came to his own, and his own rejected him not. As a race his people rejected him and lost their ancient glory. But the first builders of the Christian Church were Jews, and their labors and sufferings, their testimony and instruction, their words of warning and comfort, today support and feed the faith of millions of non-Jews. The ancient prophecy has been fulfilled: "It shall come to pass in the last days that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and many nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." Yes, blessed be the Lord God of Shem. W. H. T. D.

Vision and Message

SATURDAY, December 14. Prov. 29:18. "Where there is no vision, the people perish." One must behold the condition of the unrepentant soul in this and in the future life, in order to become an effective worker among the unsaved. Looking through the Bible telescope, he will see the multitudes of this world as Jesus saw Jerusalem, when he wept over the city about to be destroyed by the Roman army. Faith in the divine Word and the illumination of the Holy Spirit are the eyes that behold the conditions of immortals in the world to come. The preacher must see his congregation as a company who are in a preparatory life for everlasting bliss or woe. How can he warn, plead, appeal, reason and weep over the lost ones without this vision?

Thank Heaven, there is at the same moment an upward look we may take, so that the climax of the appeal may become a picture of the future life of the redeemed, the opposite of the regions of the lost. One must be able to give a vivid contrast between the devil and his dominions, and the Christ and his kingdom. He must be able not only to picture the awful wrecks on the shores of time, but the victorious landing on the golden shores of immortality. He must view also, in order to portray the vast gulf in this life between holiness and sin, the wide distance between heaven and hell in the future. His idea must take in the development of the child of God in morals and noble manhood. He must reveal the mountain peaks of Christian attainment, urging all to climb heavenward. He must feel the wonderful powers of the world to come before he can make others feel. He must know what he proclaims by heart knowledge, by the revelations of the Bible and of the Holy Spirit. No one can paint pictures beyond his experience. E. W. C.

CHAPTER SIX

WHILE Dick was having his experiences with Rufus Randall and Regua that Monday morning, Dr. Ward and Bert Chandler were holding a very interesting conference in the Doctor's study, where Bert had gone after a reasonable visit with Esther, who had then retired to the kitchen to help her mother.

Dr. Ward felt greatly interested in Bert, not only because he was to be his son-in-law, but because he had never understood how Esther with her strong, intellectual, positive character could give herself so unreservedly and even submissively to this comparatively uneducated, slow-moving young man, some six or seven years her elder. He had met Esther from the very first as an equal at the very time in her life when she was sought by numbers of the most attractive young men in Bradford, and to the surprise of every one she had accepted him. He had gone into Company 241 as a private and ended in the same place. He had won no medals and had not distinguished himself in any special manner, but he had been wounded in six different places and had an indifference to danger so marked that even in a company that was distinguished for courage he was often quoted by his comrades. No one had ever heard him utter a word of complaint or of jealousy because some of the boys had received promotions and honorable mention over him. Bert always seemed to be somewhat surprised at himself that he was alive after all he had been through and cheerfully grateful for that one fact.

"There was a fellow in Battery B down on the border who got the war medal engraved by Congress, and he used to wear it outdoors quite often," Bert said one day when the boys were asking him where he kept his decorations. "And one day a Mexican sniper across the Rio Grande saw the glimmer of this medal on the soldier's proud chest. That soldier has a fine monument to his memory in the home cemetery, but I don't envy him the honor. I'd rather be here. I've always had a sort of hankering to be alive."

Bert began his conference with Dr. Ward by asking sensible questions about the preparation necessary for his missionary service.

"I'm too old, Dr. Ward, to go to college and medical school afterward. What shall I have to do to fit myself for service as a worker in a hospital?"

DR. WARD leaned forward and his face reflected his intense interest in the subject.

"While you have been gone, Bert, some radical changes have occurred in the management of our missionary affairs. I needn't go into detail, but under the combination of all our foreign missionary societies of all the denominations we have special schools of preparation for special fields in different parts of the world. Undoubtedly, with the practical experience you have had in the ambulance service, you could get ready to go to most any field for hospital service within a year or a year and a half at most. Have you thought of the place where you want to go?"

"Yes, sir, I have, and so has Esther. We want to go to Mexico."

"How! Mexico!"

"Well, Doctor Ward, I was down on the border during the trouble with Villa, you remember?"

"I had forgotten it."

"I was there a year and a half before the war broke out in Europe, and was transferred to ambulance 241 at Captain Howard's recommendation. Things I saw down there on the border made me want to be appointed general superintendent of Mexico's educational bureau. We captured a bunch of raiding Mexicans one night, and among them were two Yaquis. One of them was sick, and when I was off duty I was allowed to nurse him. He got well and followed me all over camp like a dog. I believe he really thought a good deal of me. A month later he was shot and killed trying to escape across the line. He was brought back by the sentry who shot him, and before he died he spoke to me of his wife and children. Dr. Ward, that Yaqui, Alamerio, seemed to me to be the cry of unregenerate, undeveloped, benighted Mexico. They can say what they like of Alamerio and his tribe, but I know he was capable, mentally and morally, of development into a noble Christian specimen. And wouldn't it be the adventure of a lifetime, Dr. Ward, if Esther and I could go down there and by some miracle actually find Alamerio's wife and children and help make real humans out of them?"

It was the longest speech Dr. Ward had ever heard Bert make, and in a flash it opened up the young man's real inner life as he had never suspected it.

"Of course it would. The greatest need of poor old Mexico is education and Christian development. And you are right about the Yaquis. They have every fundamental quality to build fine manhood on. All they lack is the opportunity. Now that Mexico has settled down to some form of stable government and has won the confidence of the United States and is welcoming our school teachers and missionaries, you couldn't go to a finer place to work. Tell me how far you went in your medical service in the ambulance."

BERT modestly and briefly, as if ashamed of his long speech, mentioned one or two things that made Dr. Ward gasp with astonishment.

"Do you mean to say you actually know how to perform amputations and even operate for abdominal troubles? You were not a certified M. D.!"

"Well, you know there wasn't always time to work up to a degree over there. Once we brought in fourteen fellows in one car, and when we got 'em up to the base there were only four surgeons there. The others were dead for sleep, and nine had been bombed to death the night before in a Hun raid on the hospital. So Underwood and Nelson and I sawed off five legs and three arms and a few feet and fingers, and when we were in doubt Underwood read directions out of a medical book, telling us whether to use a hammer or a pair of scissors, and then Nelson and I went ahead as well as we could, asking Underwood to read slower when we weren't quite certain. And if I do say it, Dr. Ward, most of our operations turned out pretty well. It was either doing what we did or letting the fellows die anyway. We hadn't any right to do what we did, but no one ever court-martialed us for it. And I don't dare tell how many abdominal operations I assisted in. I saw so many of these that I believe I could take out your appendix, Dr. Ward, without the help of a lantern at night."

"I don't believe you will need a year and a half of preparation, Bert. Seems to me you had pretty good preparation over there. If I had appendicitis and were a Mexican or a Yaqui in Mexico and I couldn't get a certified surgeon who had graduated with a sheepskin, I believe I would trust you to operate on me, but I should insist on a lantern or at least a candle."

"Well, you see, sir, in case I should be unprepared at any point Esther could go on with it. She tells me she has had two years already in the new hospital course here in Bradford, and has assisted at many major operations. I feel certain that in a tight place Esther can work on the patient while I read the directions."

"Have you talked with Esther about Mexico?"

"Yes, sir. And she is even more enthusiastic about it than I am. She is quite certain we shall find Alamerio's family."

"Then you have really settled on your place of work?"

"I feel quite sure of that. And we want to prepare accordingly."

DR. WARD was tremendously interested in the whole thing.

"You don't know, Bert, but there is a splendid course of preparation in the American Missionary College for separate fields of the world. You can enter the Mexico section and at once. It is well organized and will be worth everything to you."

"Does this American College take in married couples?"

"Why, yes, I think so," said Dr. Ward, falling back in his chair with a somewhat startled expression.

"I think Esther and I could do better work in our preparation if we were married. You don't object, do you? I understand that Mrs. Ward and yourself were willing we should be married as soon as feasible after the war was over."

"It's all right, Bert, for your mother and me. May I ask you a plain question? How about your finances?"

"Yes, sir, I'm glad you asked. I believe Esther and I can live in Mexico on what I have been able to save up, and before that time I think I have enough to keep us both while we are preparing."

"But you will have a salary under the American Missionary Society, ample enough to support you both. Don't forget that. Of course you do not know anything about the changes that have taken place in the religious life of the nation during the war. But all the missionary societies in the United States have combined and pooled their purses for one financial drive that has already begun and promises to net for missionary work of the world ten or twenty times any amounts ever received or given."

"Well, I'm glad of that, of course, Dr. Ward, because Esther and I can do better work if we don't have to provide our own salaries. But as to my finances, I can take care of the two of us all right. I forgot my $10,000 insurance money. But hold on; I can't use that, can I? Because I'm not dead yet. That's quite a lot of money for a dead person to have to spend. I believe I'd rather be alive."

They were interrupted by the appearance at the study door of Esther, who came to say that three of her Sunday school class wanted to see the Doctor about their decisions if he was not too busy.

"By all means; have them come right in. But first, Esther, here is a young man who wants to take you away from us down to Mexico. Before he goes he wants to take you with him to the American College to prepare. And he says he has the means, without using his insurance money, to support you. What do you say?"

"I say," replied Esther, going up to Bert, who had risen the moment she appeared, "that I am ready to go with him anywhere, and I would rather go to Mexico than anywhere else in all the world."

"You have my blessing and you mother's. Go out and fix the date and send in those pupils of yours."

ESTHER was not ordinarily an impulsive girl in her affections, but she ran over to her father, kissed him heartily, and came back to where Bert stood.

"My heart trouble is getting worse all the time," Bert was saying as the two went out of the study. "I not only have heart trouble when you are with me, but I feel palpitations when you do a thing like that to your father. What do you suppose is the reason?"

Dr. Ward did not hear what Esther said, but a happy laugh came rippling back into the study from two of the happiest young people in the world, and he said to himself, "Thank God for happiness. The awful war has not killed it. That young man will make Esther not only happy but contented in a real home. I feel certain of it."

The Doctor rubbed his glasses, patted them back, and rose to welcome Esther's girls who came in to give their experiences and ask for counsel.

This group was followed within an hour by another, and in the evening some of the young men came in. History was being made fast, and great matters were discussed in a few days before another Sunday came around.

Dick came in before the luncheon hour that day, and went right up to his room. When his mother called him he called down the stairs that was not hungry, and asked the other not to wait for him.

"I'm afraid Regua's disappointed him," Esther said anxiously. "I saw him as he went up to his room, just after the girls went away, and he looked pretty down-hearted. Poor Dick! I wonder if Regua did refuse."

"He will tell us," Dr. Ward said, but his face was grave and his manner troubled.

LATE that night Dick stole down from his room to his father's study.

As a little boy Dick had gone with his father with every trouble, large and small. During the war his father's letters had revealed to the son the wealth of affection and understanding which he had never known his father possessed. Instead of growing apart during that awful separation the two had struck up a rare friendship and understanding. Dr. Ward found that during that correspondence, desultory and discontented as it was, that the boy who had gone away somewhat reckless and thoughtless, had qualities of the rare sort, courage, patience, endurance, a fine sense of loyalty, devotion to duty, joy in suffering, and a remarkable understanding of what America was in the war to do.

On his side the lad had learned for the first time what a rare character his father was, how far-sighted and unselfish and devoted he was to his life work, what great ideals he held, and how steadily and quietly he tried to live up to them—all this the boy found out after months of separation.

And the confidence Dick reposed in his father that night was the supreme proof of the eternal friendship that great war had established between them. At the end of half an hour Dick was sobbing like a child, his head on his father's desk, his empty coat-sleeve pathetically dangling over the arm of his father's chair as the Doctor laid his hand on the lad's head and tried to say a word of comfort.

"Surely Regua will decide at last to go with you, no matter what your father says."

"I don't know, Dad. She seemed

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD A SPIRITUAL FORCE

ONCE more we face a new year, but this will be a year of peace. Twelve months ago our boys were just beginning to sail for the great adventure "Over There," and the war cloud hung heavy over the world. Prophets said two years, three years, maybe more, would be required to loosen the grip of the modern Hun upon the throat of the peoples who would be free. But the prophets were wrong, and today the world to an almost unbelievable extent is free of despotic power and the autocratic will of royalties. Freedom has had a new birth, liberty has gained a new meaning, democracy has won a new domain.

In the year that has passed the Christian Herald Family has rallied around the President and the nation in full patriotic support of every enterprise of war. We have bought Liberty Bonds, knitted sweaters and rolled bandages for the Red Cross, given to the Y. M. C. A., the War Camp Community, the Y. W. C. A., the Salvation Army, and every other cause organized to uphold the banner of Christ or live his spirit in the camp and in the field. And with all our buying and giving we have still found it possible to send $300,000 into channels of helpfulness through our own charities.

What a wonderful year it has been! Looking back over the road we have traveled since we entered the War, the leading of a divine hand can now be clearly seen in all we have accomplished. Surely we can say with the psalmist, humbly yet confidently, "He hath not dealt so with any nation."

The new year ushered in with peace will not be like any year of peace that we have known. It will be a year of adjustment, a year full of great problems demanding solution. Yet that our God who has guided the war to the wide spreading liberty of the present will still lead on through the months to come, is our firm conviction. But how shall we know his will? In the past the Christian Herald Family has exerted a tremendous unified influence for good. During the year to come the Christian Herald Family will, as in the past, exert a potent force which will be felt for good in the new life of the world and in the councils of states. A new era is beginning, but its problems will not be all political, although even these must be solved in the spirit of Christ. But in addition there will be many deep spiritual problems, problems of adjustment, problems of cooperation, problems of evangelism, problems of construction, problems that cannot be approached successfully from any sectarian standpoint, problems in whose solution the unity of Christendom must be preserved and amplified.

It is now everywhere recognized that the War has made many great changes in former conditions and will make still more. In the beginning of this new era many of the old barriers that were obstacles to the fellowship of the nations have been swept away. Christianity has been revitalized, the divine sovereignty over the affairs of men has been made more clear. Our men at the front have been so brought face to face with the stern realities of life, death and eternity that their religion has come down to the vital principles of the Gospel, all else being immaterial. Thus one result of the War has been to clarify the religious atmosphere, and to get back to the essential things that make for man's salvation and future happiness.

In recent months the Christian Herald has taken the lead in voicing the popular demand for such a simplification of the religious life of the Christian people of America as will enable them to become cooperative workers instead of rivals as in the past. Leading ministers in almost all of the denominations have united in urging, not the abolition of denominationalism, but the broadening of denominational lines for the purpose of cooperative Christian effort in the widest sense. It is a movement which is demanded by the new conditions of the time, and it is constantly gaining in power and influence. If the nations of the world can unite on material lines for the purpose of assuring satisfactory international relations and future peace and happiness, surely the forces of the Church can afford to do the same on spiritual lines for the purpose of winning the world to Christ.

The Christian Herald speaks for United Christendom, while representing no sect or creed. This is its strength and it is its glory. For this it has been welcomed into the thousands of homes which make up the Christian Herald Family. The plans for the new year are far reaching. Through the pages of the Christian Herald in the weeks to come the leaders of all denominations will throw the light of spiritual truth across the problems of the year. Those who have shared in the activities of the Christian Herald Family in the past will crave more of the spirit of the paper during the year to come, and many thousands more will be welcomed into our Family of Christian service.

Mr. Graham Patterson, of Chicago, who for the last seven years has been in charge of the general western business of this paper, has purchased the controlling interest and has been chosen President of the Christian Herald Corporation. Mr. Patterson is well known in the field of religious journalism, and as President and Publisher he brings to his new position qualities that will result in making the publication more attractive, as well as more directly serviceable to its wide circle of readers.

Subscription Price of the Christian Herald will advance to $2.50

IN common with all other national periodical publications, the Christian Herald has been forced to increase its subscription price. Every single item that goes into the making of the Christian Herald—paper, postage, printing, engraving, wages, etc.—has increased enormously in cost. And the costs keep right on increasing.

In spite of this handicap, the Christian Herald must keep right on getting better—and bigger—and finer. The Christian Herald has an important mission to perform, and will need the hearty cooperation of every reader to do it successfully.

An opportunity will be given to all our readers to renew at the present price of $2.00 a year, as the increased price of $2.50 a year will not go into effect until January 1, 1919. No matter when your subscription expires—even if you have recently renewed and your subscription does not expire for many months—you can have your subscription extended at the present rate. This enables you to still have the Christian Herald at $2.00 a year, in spite of the ever-increasing cost of manufacture.

VITAL SUBJECTS THAT WILL INTEREST EVERY READER

DR. GRAY'S NEW SERIES ON PROPHECY

MANY of our readers will welcome the new series of articles on Prophecy, by Dr. James M. Gray, whose prophetic expositions in the Christian Herald have won the approval of a host of Bible-lovers. His forthcoming articles will carry these titles:

Prof. James M. Gray, D.D.

"How the War is Fulfilling Prophecy";
"How the Jewish Nation Will Bless the World";
"How Germany's Defeat Will Transform Europe";
"Russia and the World Problem of the Jews";
"How to Interpret Prophecy," and
"Two Great Laws of Prophetic Interpretation."

"THE CHURCH AFTER THE WAR"

THE vital need of worldwide cooperation in spiritual effort after the war is already receiving the very serious attention of eminent religious leaders. Dr. Henry Churchill King, President of the Federal Council of Churches, covered the whole subject in a nutshell in a recent address in which he said: "This is no time for the forces of righteousness to indulge in divisive differences. They must get together and work together. . . . There ought to be a comprehensive, clear-sighted, large-minded social programme, back of which the whole reunited Church shall align itself, to make sure that something worthy of the sacrifices that have gone into this war should come to pass."

The Christian Herald, foreseeing the trend of spiritual forces in this direction, organized an open forum for constructive discussion of the entire subject. About 100 well-known men have availed themselves of this opportunity to state their opinions. Expressions were received and published from Francis E. Clark, of Christian Endeavor; Bishop David H. Greer, of New York; Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman; W. R. Moody, of Northfield; C. K. Scofield, eminent Bible Expositor; Dr. David J. Burrell, of New York; Prof. R. C. Wylie; Dr. R. A. Torrey, Moody's lifelong associate; Dr. F. B. Meyer; Junius B. Remensnyder, the Nestor of American Lutheranism; Pastor C. M. Sheldon; Bishop Daniel F. Tuttle; Evangelist Wm. A. Sunday and Bishop Wm. A. Quayle. Many other expressions will be published.

MRS. LUTZ'S NEW SERIAL, "THE SEARCH"

MRS. GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL LUTZ, well known to our readers of fiction through "The Witness," "The Measure of a Man," and her other popular serials, has now written for us "The Search," a clean-cut inspiring story of war, love and religion. "The Search" comes fresh to us with the vibrant thrill of battle, the warm heart-beat of true but troubled love and the spiritually exalting and cleansing search of a soldier's soul after God. This master of dramatic situation and of human emotion has written "The Search" to our order and to our liking, and we confidently believe it is her best story. Its publication will begin with the first issue of the New Year and continue for many weeks. It will be beautifully illustrated and the instalments will be generous.

DR. SHELDON'S GREATEST SERIAL

REV. DR. CHARLES M. SHELDON, author of many fascinating and famous stories, such as "In His Steps," "Jesus Is Here," "Howard Chase," etc., has now written for us a great dramatic novel dealing masterfully with reconstruction, readjustment and religious expansion following the war. "All the World" is the title, and an instalment will be found on another page of this issue. It is the most timely story yet written, being brought up to the minute. Dr. Sheldon's general plan throughout is to picture through the emotions and adventures of the various characters the rebuilding of the world by the power of the Gospel. He puts his young people everywhere, and with a united Church here at home and a consecrated pocketbook, they build up a new world. Inspiration, vision and dramatic power make it an intensely interesting and virile story. We will furnish all back instalments to new subscribers to the Christian Herald, so that all our readers will be able to read Dr. Sheldon's story in full.

Rev. Chas. M. Sheldon, D.D.

"CIRCLING THE WORLD FOR CHRIST"

THE publication of Dr. Francis E. Clark's "Reminiscences," upon which he has been engaged for many months, has just begun in the Christian Herald under the title of "Circling the World for Christ." These recollections of a long life are filled with remarkable experiences and will interest and inspire all who read them. They show how gloriously and abundantly God rewards the faith of those who work for souls, and how the humblest effort, put forth in trust and hope, can become the seeding of a mighty tree, whose far-spreading branches will give shelter to multitudes. The story of the Beginnings of Christian Endeavor by its president, and of the many world pilgrimages to which they have led, reads like a romance.

"JERUSALEM—ITS REDEMPTION AND FUTURE"

WHEN the grand old Italian poet, Torquato Tasso, wrote his wonderful book "Jerusalem Redeemed," the world marveled at his genius and at the fertility of his imagination. But Tasso's book was a dream—a spiritual allegory. It is only now that the real story of the Redemption of Jerusalem can be told, and it is that story which the Christian Herald presents in the book entitled "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future." It tells the story of conditions in the Holy City before the War. In vivid detail it relates the experiences of the people during the years of the War itself up to the present time.

THE book reads like the unfolding of a vast drama, one of the grandest ever known. Mme. Ben Yehudah, a talented native author, tells of the sufferings and the persecutions of her people; how they were beaten, plundered, exiled and martyred; how they found refuge in cellars and caves; and how even the Turkish abuses were outdone by the brutality of the Germans. In a wonderful chapter she tells of the sudden liberation. On the eve of Hanukka, the anniversary of the "Feast of Lights" (commemorative of the first great Deliverance of the Israelites) while all were praying and dreading lest they should not live to see the light of another day, there was a sudden burst of jubilation from men and women who ran in from outside the city walls, shouting: "Hosanna! Hosanna! The English have come! We are saved!" Out they swarmed, like rats from their holes. The troops were marching in with General Allenby at their head, and the people, old and young, were weeping, shouting and singing for joy. It is a story from the pen of this gifted woman which will thrill the reader at the thought of God's wonderful manifestation in behalf of his ancient people.

But, as the book shows, the redemption is not confined to Palestine, but includes all the Bible lands: Syria, Armenia, Arabia, Mesopotamia, the old country of the patriarchs, and even the "Eden Land"—the cradle of the human race.

PROF. Edgar J. Banks, one of the contributors, tells of the great changes in the Eden country, which are destined to make it literally the "garden of the world." Lieutenant Colonel J. S. Wardlaw Milne, of the British service, who has traveled all over Mesopotamia, tells how Germany's great scheme of creating an Eastern empire in the Bible lands was thwarted, and the Berlin-to-Bagdad project brought to sudden failure. Professor Kemper-Fullerton, a most charming writer, has a wonderful story of events in Jerusalem up to a few months before capitulation. It reads like a romance, yet is reality itself. His story of the Christmas Eve, spent by a company of American and British exiles before sailing, is delightfully told. Professor George L. Robinson, who has personally visited twenty-five out of the thirty-four Jewish agricultural colonies in Palestine, including also Edom and Mount Seir, tells of the wonderful development in all of these places, and foreshadows the brilliant agricultural future of the entire Holy Land, under Allied protection, in the near future.

By Bible readers generally, and especially by all who believe in the fulfilment of the divine promise for the restoration of God's people to their ancient land "in the latter days," the book will be greatly prized. It is a volume which should be in the possession of every Christian man and woman in America, as it is splendidly illuminative of the fulfilment of God's pledge which is being brought about in a remarkable way in our lifetime. We have only hinted at a few of its attractive features, but there are many others which readers must find out for themselves. The book is illustrated with photographs by the contributors, all of which are of especial interest. We consider it on the whole the most timely book the Christian Herald has issued in many years.

DR. JOHN H. FINLEY, of the American Red Cross Commission in Palestine, has made a very enlightening statement with respect to the program for the future of the Holy Land. In that statement, which was published in the New York Evening Post, and which is also given in this book, Dr. Finley explains that, while he would not presume to offer advice to the peace conference, his own desires as to Palestine are:—

1. That Palestine, now redeemed and held in trust by western civilization, be not entrusted to any single nation, race or creed, but be preserved by an international agreement and by international guarantees as a monument to the civilization of the Occident.
2. That Palestine, because of its relation to modern civilization, is too precious a conquest to leave to future risks.

In the Holy Land at present, affairs are administered by a remarkable group of scholarly, conscientious, able men. General Allenby has picked for this work at the outset men of whom Christianity may be proud. Dr. Finley tells of an impressive meeting with the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, one of the most interesting religious personalities in the world today. This eminent dignitary, although almost a recluse, had still kept in touch with the world movement. This is what he said to Dr. Finley:

"No one can dispute the fact known to God and confirmed by your noble history, oh citizens of America, that out of compassion and charity He created you, to do good to humanity, and has through you always accomplished good work, keeping you innocent of all evil doing.

"Joy and gladness to you, and may God be praised who showers good as He desires. No one can wonder at this when you are the children of so generous a mother, the great nation—I mean Great Britain, with her glorious past and exalted glory.

"Your good works cannot be counted; and you should extend your arm from beyond the seas to grasp the hand of that mother, full of love and compassion, for one reason only, to further the cause of the oppressed and to turn aside with blows the hand of the oppressor in this bloody and fearful war, the like of which has never been seen before, and, by God's will, may never be seen again, such glory and honor before God and man will suffice.

"On behalf of these in general, and of Moslems in particular, I burn incense on the altars of gratitude, and pray the great God to make you a good reward, defend you from every evil, make your benevolent undertakings successful and hasten the days of peace which we all await impatiently."

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY"

Report of the Philadelphia
Prophetic Conference

NO amount of trumpeting can make a poor book sell or a dull book find readers. A volume must have intrinsic merit, both as to the importance or attractiveness of the subject treated, and as to the literary skill and charm which delight the reader. But there is something beyond and above these in the book "Light on Prophecy," published by the Christian Herald, for it links up the prophecies of the Bible with the great events of today and shows conclusively that we are living in an age of prophetic fulfillment.

When we set out several months ago to print "Light on Prophecy," we felt that it was a book which our readers would welcome. It held something that very many good people want to know.

The result, however, far exceeded our expectations. "Light on Prophecy" has now passed through four large editions, and the demand is still growing.

We would wish to see this important and inspiring volume in the hands of every reader of the Christian Herald. Those who have read it are loud in their praise of its value and especially the spiritual uplift it conveys. The book contains all the notable addresses on prophecy delivered at the Philadelphia Bible Conference a few months ago, which was the most important gathering of its kind ever held in this country or perhaps in the world. It was a conference which exalted Christ throughout, and gave rare and stimulating messages to His followers throughout the world.

"OH, MONEY! MONEY!"

By Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Just David," "Pollyanna," etc. The Romance of a New England Cinderella and a Western Millionaire.

"IF you don't know how to get happiness out of five dollars, you don't know how to get it out of five thousand," says Maggie, the cheery philosopher of "Oh, Money! Money!" and this is the keynote of Mrs. Porter's latest story.

Stanley Fulton, a bachelor with only dollars for companionship, begins to wonder what will become of his twenty millions when he dies. In order to test in advance his only relatives—three distant cousins whom he has never seen—he decides to give them each one hundred thousand dollars and then appear among them as plain John Smith and watch the result of his experiment. Out of a clear sky came three checks to the three Blaisdell families. How each family tried in its own way to get happiness from its unexpected fortune—and failed; and how Poor Maggie without trying and without a fortune, succeeded, is told by Mrs. Porter in "Oh, Money! Money!"

Poor Maggie's Philosophy:

"Money's a test. It brings out what's strongest in you, every time."
"It isn't the money that does things, it's the man behind the money."

"A GREATER CHRISTMAS"

By Rev. A. Edwin Keigwin, D.D., Pastor of the West End Presbyterian Church, New York City

THE approaching Christmas is to be the most inspiring since the birth of Christ, and the Messianic story will make a greater appeal to the hearts of men than ever before. Dr. A. Edwin Keigwin has written a Christmas gift book that has a special message for the opening hours of an era of reconstruction. It is entitled "The Greater Christmas." The book is delightfully seasonable.

It is pervaded by the scent of evergreen, the sentiment of mistletoe and the spirit of the Bethlehem Message. It is the very book to point the way to true Christmas happiness, lasting world peace and all the year round personal power. The book is the voice of sane faith.

While gripping the heart it holds the mind. It reflects a faith refined in the crucible of experience. The author has captured elusive spiritual values and presented them in a way that is striking and helpful. The book has personality. In laying it down there comes over one the feeling of having grasped the hand of an old and tried friend.

In place of Christmas cards secure this book at once and send it to your friends. You will be giving them exactly what all the world is seeking. We have been terribly disillusioned during these awful years of war. Reality in religion and practice will be the demand of the years to come, and this is precisely what "The Greater Christmas" embodies.

We will send a copy of "The Greater Christmas," postpaid, together with $2.35 ($2.85 after Jan. 1, 1919) for one year, for.....

We will send two copies of "The Greater Christmas," postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00 ($2.50 after January 1, 1919).

RED LETTER BIBLE—Genuine India Paper Edition

THE only genuine edition of the Red Letter Bible is the Authorized or King James' Version, unchanged save for the variation of the color in the type. Two colors (Red and Black) are employed, in accordance with the simple plan devised by the late Dr. Louis Klopsch, the Originator of the Red Letter principle applied to the Holy Scriptures.

1. In the Old Testament the passages quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which he referred, are Printed in Red.
2. In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of the Saviour are Printed in Red.
3. A Red Star (*) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah.

The Christian Herald Red Letter Bible Contains Full References; also a Concordance, Subject

Index, and Dictionary—all under One Alphabetical Arrangement—together with Helps, Maps, and Numerous Illustrations.

The text is set in Bold-Face Minion, especially designed for this work. There are 268 pages of Helps or Concordance and 17 superb Maps. This gem of a Bible, small in bulk, light in weight, very legible and very durable, weighs only 20 ounces. It is bound in American Levant, overlapping edges, red-under-gold, and makes altogether the handiest and most satisfactory Bible now on the market.

We send this superb Bible, postpaid, together with $4.50 ($5.00 after Jan. 1, 1919) for one year, for.....

We will send a copy, postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers as a reward for sending us two NEW yearly subscriptions to The Christian Herald with $2.00 for each ($2.50 for each after January 1, 1919).

The same Bible bound in Genuine Morocco, Calf Finish, Leather Lining, Silk Sewed, which will wear a lifetime, with The Christian Herald for one year, for $5.50 ($6.00 after Jan. 1, 1919).

We will send a copy, postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers as a reward for sending us three NEW yearly subscriptions to The Christian Herald with $2.00 for each ($2.50 after Jan. 1, 1919).

BIG AMERICAN FLAG—4x6 FEET

Welcome Our Heroes Home

Reproduced from actual photograph. Double-Striped. Brilliant Colors.

EVERY good American should show his colors these days. Let "Old Glory" mark your home as one which stands by our President, our army and our navy. Celebrate our victories by displaying this fine symbol of our national unity. Show your flag on holidays, when the boys come home, fly it for parades, reunions, and patriotic occasions. Let this big flag tell the story of your joy in this great moment of our country's history.

Here is a wonderful opportunity to secure a big, strongly made American flag at way below the cost in the stores.

To make sure of your flag you must ask for it now. Our supply is limited, and when our present stock is gone it is certain we cannot obtain more at the low price at which we contracted for these.

This offer below will be withdrawn as soon as our present supply of flags is gone. American flags of this kind have doubled in price and we will not be able to replenish our supply except at a big increase in cost to us. Our original order for thousands gave us the advantage of a big reduction in price and we are giving you the benefit of it.

We will send one of these Flags postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year for.....

$4.00 after Jan. 1, 1919

We will send one of these Flags, postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers who send us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald at $2.00 each ($2.50 each after January 1, 1919.)

Gene Stratton-Porter's Novels

"CLOSER to Nature and the Almighty" is the philosophy of Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter, the author of "The Harvester," "The Girl of the Limberlost," and other marvelously successful stories—to bring those who read her books "closer to Nature and the Almighty." Mrs. Porter has opened the eyes of thousands to the wonder and glory of the world about them.

Mrs. Porter's stories all have, as a fundamental reason of their existence, the author's great love of Nature. To impart this love to others—to inspire many hundreds of thousands to look for the first time with seeing eyes at the pageant of the out-of-doors—is her gift of rare quality. In writing of "The Girl of the Limberlost," Mrs. Porter said: "This comes fairly close to my idea of a good book. The book can, and does, present a hundred pictures that will draw any reader in closer touch with Nature and the Almighty."

Mrs. Porter's novels are not only wholesome and clean, but they are romantic and cheerful. The people who live in their pages do things and accomplish tasks worth while. Over 3,000,000 copies of Mrs. Porter's books have been sold.

Special Edition of Mrs. Porter's Novels

By a special arrangement with the publishers of Mrs. Porter's works, we procured a special edition of six volumes of the most popular stories by this talented writer. The first edition of these books was quickly taken by our readers. Another edition has just been received. The six volumes were printed from the plates used in the original edition—the type being large and clear and the paper of exceptional quality. The books are bound in fine cloth with gilt tops—twenty-five full page illustrations.

We have only a limited number of this second edition, and when they are taken, we cannot print any more, as the government prohibits the use of the special quality paper used in this edition. Those who desire this set of six volumes should order them at once.

The titles are as follows: "At the Foot of the Rainbow"; "The Harvester"; "The Girl of the Limberlost"; "Freckles"; "Laddie—A True Blue Story"; and "Song of the Cardinal."

We will send this set of 6 volumes of Mrs. Porter's Books, prepaid, together with the Christian Herald for 1 year for $5.00. Payment can be made in 5 monthly installments of $1.00 each if preferred.

EXCELLENT CHRISTMAS GIFTS AT LITTLE COST.

These six volumes will make unusual Christmas gifts—at little cost, too.

10 Wonderful Color Views of the HOLY LAND

As Christ Knew It—From the Brush of a Master Artist

HERE is a great opportunity for you to secure ten beautiful reproductions in full color of the most famous and accurate Holy Land paintings that have ever been made. These works of a great artist have preserved to the world the Holy Land of Bible days, that country known and loved so well by our Saviour. In the past you have known the Holy Land only through the most meager and uninspired drawings, none of them presenting this wonderful country in its true beauty and charm. Now you are offered masterpieces that put before your eyes the sacred birthplace of Christianity as Christ himself knew it. For the first time ten of these views in all the beautiful tints and shades of the land itself are offered you at cost of manufacture only.

LIKE A VISIT TO PALESTINE

AS you look at these pictures you feel that you yourself stand with the artist on the slopes of Olivet and look across the valley of Jehoshaphat, through which winds the old road to Samaria and beyond, under the bright sunshine, you see the walls of Jerusalem. Through these works of art you travel the Jordan road as did our Saviour. You feel the charm, the beauty, and the dignity of every sacred place. These reproductions are in themselves a trip to the Holy Land.

David Roberts of the Royal Academy made the long trip from England for the purpose of painting the most famous scenes of Biblical history in order that the Christian world might have truthful pictures of the birthplace of its religion. He expressed in water colors the scenes of Christ's life and activities as well as many things of historical interest in Egypt and the Nile country, the very cradle of our modern civilization, which he visited while on his way to Palestine. The Christian Herald has made colored reproductions of ten of Mr. Roberts' great paintings and offer them at a very small sum.

With each of the ten pictures goes a complete description of the scene depicted with mention of the historical and Biblical interest that attaches to the place. Every student of the Bible and every person interested in the life and progress of those early days will appreciate the beauty and value of these reproductions of the great scenes in scriptural history.

This is a special offer and is strictly limited by the supply of the picture folios that have been completed for distribution.

Add 10 cents to your remittance and one of these booklets will be sent postpaid. Any number can be ordered at 10 cents each—and they will be mailed to one or different addresses, making an unusual Christmas remembrance.

Patchwork

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE little old lady displayed the quilt proudly.

"It was the very first I ever made," she told me, "and I've made a great many quilts in my time. This looks extremely simple beside some of them—but I was so small when I made it that it seemed a great task."

I duly admired the quilt, and then—"How old were you when you made it?" I questioned. "It's so wonderfully well done that you couldn't have been very small!"

The little old lady laughed, and the laughter of her was curiously young laughter.

"The year that I was eight," she told me, "my mother decided that I should be taught to do plain sewing, and one day she called me in from the garden where I was playing and gave me a tiny silver thimble and a wickerwork basket and a great box of vari-colored calico cut into squares. And she told me that every girl child should know how to piece quilts—and that she wanted me to spend half an hour sewing every day."

"I looked regretfully out into the sunny garden. And then I looked curiously down at the box of calico squares."

"I'll make a quilt!" I told my mother, "if you will give me a whole length of goods to make it out of. But I can't make it out of these little scraps!"

"I'll never forget how my mother laughed."

"My dear," she told me, "a patchwork quilt is always made out of little scraps just like the ones that I've given to you. That's why folk call it a patchwork quilt. You must sew the patches into squares of four, and then you must sew the squares of four into other, larger squares."

"I looked out again into the sunny garden. Every flower in that garden seemed beckoning to me."

"But," I objected, "the patches don't match. They're all different colors. I can't make a quilt out of so many different colors!"

"My mother drew me down beside her, and began to count the calico squares in the big box. She talked as she counted them."

"My dear," she said, "the art of making a patchwork quilt is the art of putting any number of colors together so that the effect will be pleasing. Patchwork quilts are never made of only one color. If they were it would be easier, as you suggested, to make the quilt out of one length of goods." And then she put the silver thimble on my middle finger and showed me how to set the small stitches evenly."

The little old lady smoothed the quilt with loving, wrinkled fingers.

"At first it was very hard work," she told me. "My hand grew cramped and my eyes grew tired. Often I pierced my finger with the sharp needle, and when the blood came, I cried. But every day it grew easier. At first I hated the tiny stitches that I had to take; at first I didn't like picking out the different squares that were to be sewed together. But after a while it grew to be a sort of a game with me, and I enjoyed the color effects that I was able to get by putting patches of cloth together. When the quilt was all finished, I was sorry. And I was quite ready to begin on a new one."

I looked at the quilt that lay spread out before me. It seemed a very large and complicated quilt, indeed. And I pictured a tiny girl stitching evenly, regularly on it. . . .

As if she read my thoughts the little lady spoke.

"Of course," she told me, "I didn't do the hardest work. It required more experienced hands than mine to really make something of my patches. After I had finished the piecing my mother quilted it. . . ."

I HAD a letter yesterday from a girl in Georgia.

"I would love to talk with you," she wrote. "I am so troubled about so many things. I can't seem to understand—to get my life straightened out. I am like a little child with a patchwork quilt, and my pieces don't match, and I can't get them fitted together."

Sometimes, friends of mine, life is like a patchwork quilt. We can't see any sense or any color scheme in the scraps that are laid before us, and we wish vainly for a whole and unbroken length of cloth to cut our destiny out of. We can't understand why we should be given patches to work with, why we must match shades, why we must fit pieces together. We can't understand!

And yet, if we put on the thimble of Self-Reliance, if we take the thread of Willingness and the needle of Purpose into our hands, we shall find that the piecing of them can be made into a delightful and fascinating game. And as the scraps grow into a thing of usefulness and beauty, as the patches fit themselves into something strong and worth while, the fascination and the delight of the game will grow. And when we have sewed all the pieces firmly together we can sit back and smile, knowing that other hands can be trusted to add to our work those finishing touches that it is beyond our power to supply.

Life is like a patchwork quilt. But that doesn't mean that life cannot be enjoyed, cannot be shaped into what we want it to be. That doesn't mean that we can't make of life what we will.

If the little girl of long ago had sat down by her box of calico squares and sobbed because she couldn't go out to play in the garden, she wouldn't have had a very beautiful bit of work to show to me many years later. And if we, who have discovered that our lives are like patchwork, sit down to cry, we will not, at the end of our task, have a beautiful bit of work to show, either.

Oh, friends of mine, take up the patches that are given you and sew them carefully together, and if you prick your finger until it bleeds, be able to laugh. And if the gardens of the world beckon irresistibly, try, by matching your fragments, to put some of their flower colors into your work. And if you grow tired, sing a bit of song to keep the heart of you sweet.

Because it's the spirit back of the patchwork that makes the multi-colored pieces into a perfect whole.

THE AUTUMN WOODS

THE woods lay dreaming in a topaz dream,
And we, who silently roamed hand in hand;
Were pilgrims in a strange, enchanted land,
Where life was love, and love was all agleam.

We did not speak, we did not need to say
The thoughts that lay so buried in our hearts;
The thoughts as sweet as springtime rain that starts
The buds to blossoming in wistful May.

We did not need to speak, we could not speak
The wonder-words that we in silence knew;
We walked as very little children do,
Who feel, but cannot tell, the things they seek.

Beyond a screen of bushes, bending low,
We knew that fair Titania lay at rest,
Her pillowed head upon her lover's breast,
Her kisses swift as birds that come and go.

And underneath that wall of mottled stone
We knew sleeping beauty lay in state,
Entangled in a mist of tears, to wait
The prince whose kiss would raise her to a throne.

Perhaps a witch with single flaming eye
Was watching from beneath the hemlock tree;
And fairies, that our gaze might never see,
Laughed at us as we, hand in hand, crept by.

Laughed at us? No, I somehow think they knew
That you and I were kin to them that day!
I think they knew that we were miles away
From everything but make-believe come true.

I think they knew that, singing through the air,
There thrilled a vague, insistent, harp-like call;
And that, where sumac blazed against the wall,
You held me close, and kissed my wind-tossed hair!

They Save Teeth Now in a New Way

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

They End the Film

Countless people are now cleaning their teeth in a new way. And modern dentists all over America are urging other people to join them.

The old ways proved inefficient. As millions know, they failed to prevent tooth troubles. Despite the tooth brush, tartar, decay and pyorrhea constantly became more common.

Some years ago the reason was discovered. It lies in a film—a slimy film—which constantly forms on teeth.

That film gets into crevices, hardens and stays. It resists the tooth brush, and most tooth troubles are now known to be due to it.

The film is what discolors, not the teeth. It hardens into tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. And many troubles besides tooth troubles are traced to this germ-breeding film.

After years of research, a way has been found to combat it. Able authorities have proved this fact by adequate clinical tests.

For general use the method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And we supply a special tube to all who ask, so the millions may quickly know it.

Let It Convince You

The Pepsodent results are quickly apparent. After a few days' use you will never forget them.

The basis is pepsin, the digestant of albumin; for the film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve the film, then to constantly prevent its accumulation.

But pepsin must be activated. The ordinary agent is an acid, harmful to the teeth. For long that fact made pepsin seem impossible.

Now modern science has discovered a harmless, activating method. Five governments already have granted patents. It is that method which makes possible this efficient application.

Four years have been spent by dentists in proving the value of this product. Now we urge all people to prove it by a home test.

Send the coupon for a One-Week Tube. Use it like any tooth paste. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the film. See how teeth whiten as the fixed film disappears.

All this means that the film which wrecks teeth can now be effectively combated. And you will never cease to do that when you see what it means to you.

Cut out the coupon now.

Marion Harland's Corner

Familiar Talk on War Christmas Gifts

II

"LINEN is horribly high!" was the alliterative sigh of one woman when we were chatting together of the eligibility of handkerchiefs as presents.

"And so is worsted!" groaned another. "And there are hundreds of lovely things I could make of it!"

There is so much reason in her moan that I should hesitate to commend "wool"—or "crewl," as our mothers called it—to the band of earnest Cornerites who have appealed to me for help, if I had not knowledge of presentable articles which may be fashioned of it without seriously depleting the maker's purse.

A pair of bedside slippers to which soft soles may be sewed by the artificer's own hand are easily wrought with knitting-needles or crochet-hook at a cost of less than a dollar, soles and all. Bows of ribbon of harmonious color will make them elegant.

Enough worsted for the cover of a hot-water bag may be bought for about sixty cents. Having known the abiding comfort of these covers in my own home for forty years, I call the attention of home-makers to them with cheerful confidence.

Cover of Hot-Water Bag

Upon medium-sized ivory or celluloid knitting-needles (about No. 5) hang fifty-six stitches. Knit straight across, backward and forward, purling two stitches and knitting two plain, until you have a ribbed strip three and a half inches deep. In the last round, widen at regular intervals to leave spaces in which the ribbon may be run. Then knit plain across and back until you have done six inches more, and begin to shape the bag by narrowing a stitch at each end of the needle, alternating this round with one knit in the usual way—to avoid rounding the bag too abruptly—until you have twenty-five stitches left, when bind off the last round. Knit another piece exactly like the first, and sew or crochet the two at the edges on the wrong side, leaving the top open. Run a stout ribbon through the spaces left by widening, and draw the mouth up to contain a rubber hot-water bag, shirring the top into a ruffle.

The rubber bag filled with hot water, the top sewed securely in place and thus encased, will hold the heat all night in the coldest weather. It is a priceless boon to an invalid and a comfort to any one who is troubled with cold feet. Filled and applied to an aching chest or a "colicky" stomach, it brings almost certain relief, and may be kept in place for hours without losing efficiency.

No nursery or sick-room should be without at least one of these woolen covers. They may be knit of odds and ends of worsteds for home and everyday use, or made into handsome gifts by a judicious contrast of colors between the ruffle and the main body of the case.

BEFORE leaving the wool counter, we must say a word or two in behalf of our boys, big and little.

One bright-eyed lad of thirteen told me gleefully last week that he was "knitting wristlets for the soldiers in the trenches," having learned the art from his mother. As a rule, sons are dependent for these comforts upon the women of their respective families.

A pair of ribbed wristlets—warm and elastic—may be turned off ready for wear in a few hours by a skilful knitter. They will go well with the stout mittens contributed by another well-wisher; a third may complete the outfit for skating, coasting and snowballing, by the donation of a scarf (a "muffler" they call it now). A worsted cap, coming low over the ears, and topped by a gay tassel, will make John, Jr., the envy of the Skating and Sledding Club. Grand-mama will make it for him on stormy evenings.

Those same stormy evenings and gusty afternoons are the knitters' golden opportunities. The old-time invitation, "Bring your knitting and stay to tea," that voiced heartfelt hospitality, has been revived in force by our generation. Few conscientious patriots and sensible economists are "entertaining" this winter. By general consent the rich as well as the "half-way poor" have signed pledges in the fear of God and the love of their fellowmen, which make high living a moral wrong. But we cannot smother the altar-fires of good-fellowship in our hearts. If it be true that never before within the memory of the oldest woman of us all were so few receptions, dinner-parties, and other social "affairs" given in city or country, it is as true that never before was the yearning for congenial companionship stronger and more universal.

AND since all of us are busy with needles and wools, the age-worn formula has been brought into play, with a new application. In thousands of cozy living-rooms the knitting sisterhood suspend operations to sip a cup of "afternoon tea" with neighbors who have been bidden to the modest function, or have dropped in, knitting-bags in hand. Then we resume our work, and to the castanet-accompaniment of clicking needles, the war-talk that has much to do now with the home coming of the warriors, and has everything to do with the love which we bear to our country and the heartfelt resolve to do all that in us lies to serve her in her hour of need.

A tea-cozy comes in patly at this point. It is too well known to require a detailed description. In its simplest form it is a wadded case, made of two semi-circular sides, open at the bottom, shaped and measured to fit easily over the teapot to keep the contents hot indefinitely. Personal taste and convenience have free play in choice of materials and construction of the outer covering. In a majority of households, where the cardinal law "Let nothing be wasted" is in regular practice, the "piece-drawer" will supply remnants or left-overs of silk, satin, brocade, figured woolen stuffs, "silkolene," or cretonne, out of which cozies may be wrought. A gay "harlequin" or patchwork-case may be brought into sight if one has a lively fancy and cunning fingers. Or a remnant of plain black, brown, blue, or "changeable" takes on grace and character if it be initialed on one side, and finished with a border of silken cord. A loop of ribbon, braid or cord, by which the cozy may be lifted or slipped easily over the teapot, should be stitched firmly into place.

For the lonely tea-drinker or chronic invalid a "cozy" at once pretty and serviceable may be made of white twilled linen or "mercerized" cotton, fitted to the wee "individual" teapot. The wadded lining should be quilted more closely than if it were to be stationary, and basted to the outside at the bottom, that it may be removed and washed when soiled. The outer cover may be scalloped at the bottom, and overcast on the sides with mercerized cotton of fast color. An initial on one side and a bow of ribbon on top change a commonplace article into a personal tribute to be treasured as a keepsake. This cozy has the merit of being easily and safely laundered—no trifling advantage when it is taken into tri-daily use.

COME we now to a notable feature of holiday gifts all over the Christian world—Christmas cards. I cannot discourage too strongly the gross unwisdom of investing the funds left in the family treasury in the costly sections of decorated pasteboard exposed everywhere for sale at this season. Some are passable works of art. More are flashy and meretricious. The man or woman who satisfies conscience or a sentimental wish to please lover or friend by paying even half a dollar for one extolled by the "saleslady" as "real tasty and so appropriate to the season!" might as well choose a gaudy advertisement of a haberdasher's warerooms, or a grocer's catalogue of holiday luxuries. The same may be said of inexpensive cards stamped with "the usual thing, you know," which are bought by the dozen to be slipped into bag, or basket, or parcel on Christmas Eve.

If you have tolerable skill with pencil or brush, draw or paint the cards intended for close friends. A sketch of a scene endeared to both of you by association—perhaps copied from a photograph—carries with it a wealth of significance. A favorite flower, painted in water-color, is a visible love-message. If you can do none of these things, select with purposeful care a simple card commemorative of the birthday, and write your personal "word in season" with your name upon it.

I HAIL the opportunity of speaking here of the benevolent ingenuity of individuals and organizations that have at their own expense, designed and put upon the market cards which constitute the recipient a member of one of the bands which is feeding the starving and clothing the naked little ones made homeless by the incredibly wicked war which is over now—thank God! We are too much in danger of forgetting that the desolations wrought by four years of carnage and lust for conquest are still to be repaired, and that we may not stay our bountiful hands for months—it may be years—to come.

As a specimen of the manner in which this beautiful mission is carried on, I select one laid upon my desk by a trustworthy agent—herself a native of war-blighted France, although long a resident of this country.

In one corner of the pretty card appears the head of the American eagle, bearing in the beak a card inscribed,

"America's Christmas Greeting to the Orphans of France"

A group of hungry babies reach out eager hands for the placard, below which lie parcels done up in Christmas ribbons, fruits, etc. "Sold for the benefit of 'Le Paquet de Orphelin'" is printed in the lower corner of the card. Others are decorated with different scenes, all freighted with one and the same meaning. They are sold for five cents apiece, and every penny thus collected goes over the sea for the holy purpose named. This is but one of perhaps a dozen societies having the like end in view. American women may well make the nickels and dimes thus invested a thank offering to the Prince of Peace.

OUR last words today have to do with what I twice referred to as "kitchenly kindness." The phrase is more expressive than appears at the first glance. It signifies the cordial transfer of foods prepared under the direction, if not by the hands, of the housemother, to be shared with friends or neighbors or with the needy. Cannot our Corner, especially now that restrictions are largely removed, set the example of reviving a gracious custom beloved by our foremothers?

We may not pass the limit of sugar set by a wise government, but lately made more generous and to which we have set our hand and seal. But we have still corn and other syrups for candy and cake-making. And in many a home there are in closets and cupboards empty candy-boxes, mementoes of better times. Remove the labels, and paste over the vacant spaces devices of your own composition—humorous or friendly. Fill the boxes with home-made confectionery, and tie with Christmas ribbons. Study pleasing conceits that will brighten other lives.

Finally, dearly beloved Cornerites—whom I pridefully account as members of my very own family at this consecrated festival—make Christmas letters play a prominent part in the payment of the obligation laid upon you personally by the return of the Day of Days, to lift the burdens of those to whom Christ has called you to minister. Your light purse may have been emptied before you get to the foot of the list made out in generous anticipation of the anniversary. Your heart is still full of peace and good will. Give it vent in written words. Cast about in your mind for the names of such as may be cheered and strengthened by a few lines, penned for them and for no other—not the conventional platitudes one finds on Christmas cards. Let heart speak to heart. And (suffer me thus far!) if you have, in all this wide beautiful world for which Christ died—an enemy or estranged friend whom you "hate," and whom you "would pay back in kind" if you could, be reconciled to him as if he were, in very truth, your brother. Let not the Christmas cup of blessing be soured or embittered by uncharitableness still less by actual enmity.

"If thou love not thy brother whom thou hast seen, how canst thou love God whom thou hast not seen?"

me absolutely set against it. And we've been imagining a horrible thing. Suppose the Government should make out a case against Mr. Randall, could they send him to state prison? And if so, I could not ask Requa to go with me then."

"The cases so far proved by the Government have resulted only in heavy fines. But popular feeling is growing that imprisonment is the only real punishment. It is within the possibilities that Randall may suffer as an example. Here is an item that shows how people over the country feel."

DR. WARD picked up a newspaper, and read from a column of New York news:

"New York Drive Brings Million from Tax Dodgers

"NEW YORK, Aug. 11. (Special)—As the result of a drive inaugurated by the Collector of Internal Revenue for the Second New York district, more than $1,000,000 has been realized from persons who sought to evade income, excess profits, and commodity taxes. A single delinquent tax payment Saturday was for $100,000."

"The people are beginning to demand imprisonment for men who treat the Government in this manner," Dr. Ward went on. "It is one of the most disheartening things in our whole history that during the war and now when it is over there are thousands of men in America who have no standards of morals and no definitions of patriotism. While you boys were fighting over there for the freedom of the world these men over here like Randall have been fighting for profits. Next to the Germans they are the most hated of any class in America. Some of them have only just begun to find out. Randall, unless I am mistaken, is one. And he would be glad to make

The World's Need of a League of Nations

By REV. CHARLES E. JEFFERSON, D.D.

THE one supreme task now before the world is the creation of a League of Nations. To this task every man and every woman should lend his mind. It is a colossal piece of work, and it calls for the combined wisdom and enthusiasm of us all. For it is only in minds raised to fervent heat that such a work can be accomplished. Not only must the leaders of thought meditate and plan, but the masses of the people must think and talk. It is a matter which concerns us every one, and therefore each one of us is under obligations to make his own individual contribution.

We must first of all grasp the moral necessity for the formation of such a league, and grasping this we must talk the League up in our community until it becomes the ideal and the desire of all the people. As our President has said, this is not a statesmen's war, but a people's war. All the people have suffered, and all the people must have something to say about the terms by which the war is to be ended. No treaty of peace should be counted satisfactory by the people which does not have as its main provision the creation of a League of Nations. In ages past such a scheme was impossible, but we are living in the twentieth century. Old things have passed away. Many things are becoming new. The great war has modified profoundly the entire world situation, and things which were impossible five years ago are practicable today.

Let no one be daunted by the difficulties which must be met and overcome in working out such a plan. Of course there are difficulties, numerous and perplexing, but what are we in the world for, if not to grapple with difficulties and by patience and courage overcome them? There were once those who said that to combine thirteen restitution now if there was any way out. Did he seem at all disturbed when you called him a profiteer?"

"Dad, he started to say something like a defense. Then he looked at me as if he was afraid of something, broke off his sentence in the middle and got up and went out, storming along the hall and banging the door like one beside himself. Innocent men do not act as he acted."

"I'm afraid he is guilty, Dick, because in every case so far brought by the Government indictments have been brought, without an exception."

"Dad, what shall I do, what will Requa do, if her father has to pay the penalty of imprisonment? It seems too horrible to imagine."

"I can't answer your question, Dick. You have come home to real trouble, lad. Stand up like a soldier and trust your heavenly Father for strength, for vain is the arm of man in cases like these."

THEY talked late into the night, and before Dick went upstairs to his room his father prayed, kneeling by the side of the boy, an arm over his shoulder, commending him to the good God for comfort and strength in this time of unusual trial. And when Dick went out of the study he carried with him some gleam of hope for the future. But in what way it would be realized he could not possibly determine.

But as the week passed, it smote Dick with a fresh blow that Requa sent no word, and he did not attempt to call. Esther, in a burst of feeling, late in the week offered to go and see Requa and have a talk with her, but Dick, whose heart was sore and whose mind was in a turmoil, declined her offer and almost frightened her by the stern attitude he assumed when he declared that the affair lay entirely between Requa and himself. It was for her or her father to speak the next word.

The Scientific Way to Make Soup

A Prize Recipe

The Van Camp Soup we deal with here started with a famous French recipe. It won the prize in a Parisian culinary contest. A noted chef from the Hotel Ritz in Paris brought it to our kitchens.

The original recipe was considered the finest soup of its kind in existence.

Three Years of Tests

In the Van Camp kitchens, our scientific cooks—all college trained—worked three years to perfect it.

They tested hundreds of methods and blends. They fixed a standard for every material. When they reached the pinnacle of flavor, they recorded every step.

Now a six page formula, minutely specifying every detail, is forever followed in that soup.

A 24-Hour Process

This particular soup requires 24 hours in the making. It combines 19 ingredients, all of which meet a fixed standard.

Some must be cut to a certain size. Some must be analyzed. Each must be cooked at a certain heat for a specified number of minutes. Thus the soup when done is exactly like the model soup adopted.

Simply Heat It

The soup comes to you at a trifling cost, ready to serve when you heat it. It is matchless in flavor—the finest soup of its kind that was ever created.

So with all the 18 Van Camp Soups. Each was a famous recipe. Each was perfected through countless tests by culinary experts. And each brings you a superlative soup, ready to serve in a minute. Try a can today.

MENTHOL COUGH DROPS

The Inhalation Treatment for Whooping-Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs.

"USED WHILE YOU SLEEP"

Established 1879

Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs. Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping-Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it nips the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous cold.

Mrs. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp."

The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights.

It is called a boon by Asthma sufferers.

For the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and as an aid in the treatment of Diphtheria, Cresolene is valuable on account of its powerful germicidal qualities.

It is a protection to those exposed.

Cresolene's best recommendation is its 39 years of successful use.

Joseph Forgives His Brothers

International Sunday School Lesson for December 15. Gen. 45:1-15

Repentance and Reunion

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THE story of Joseph is a great illustration of Paul's teaching in Romans 8:28, "All things work together for good to them that love God." The hand of Providence was never more clearly seen than when Jacob sent his ten sons to buy grain in Egypt, and their ill-treated brother was the man who sat in the place of power in the time of famine. The large-mindedness of Joseph is seen in his recognition of that fact; to him it was not that they had sent him thence but God.

This efficient administrator dealt with the foreigners personally and instantly recognized his brothers despite the changes of twenty years. Of course they did not know the slave boy in the full-grown man clothed in power and speaking through an interpreter. Why then did not this food dictator reveal himself to them at once? He must find out first if the years have made a change in the disorderly, selfish, unscrupulous band who had dealt so harshly with the spoiled child on the caravan route long before. Perhaps he had expressly ordered all men from the land of Canaan brought to his attention in the hope of tidings from home. Yet only trouble and care would result if their unbrotherly attitude was unchanged. He must test their hearts.

His First Test—Adversity

Joseph knew how misfortune reveals the character, and therefore he spoke roughly to the Hebrews, accusing them as spies, throwing them into prison at the caprice of a stranger on a false charge. Doubtless on the way down they had thought much of their sin and wondered how their brother had fared as he traversed the road a bond-slave. Perchance they had even talked about him and conjectured as to the possibility of finding him. Now at all events their guilty consciences speak: this misfortune must be a just retribution! Reuben reminds them of the way their injured brother had looked. They agree that they are only getting a taste of their own medicine.

Joseph had to hide his tears, for his heart yearned toward them. But he did not yet know how far this penitence went. To test them further and to get an excuse to see his own full-brother Benjamin he kept Simeon bound and sent the distressed company back to Jacob with strict orders to bring the other son and thus verify their defense.

The Second Test—Loyal Unselfishness

After a long wait because of Jacob's reluctance to risk Benjamin's life, Judah pledges himself to bring him safe home again and the long trip is made once more, this time with anxious and wondering minds, doubtless with heartfelt prayers for guidance. They are given a royal welcome, Simeon released, and all feasted together. But as they return toward home, laden with grain, Joseph by stratagem tests them to the very core. He sends officers to accuse them of having taken his silver cup, which had been hidden at his order in Benjamin's sack.

The bewildered Hebrews protest their innocence in vain. The search is made and the cup found. It looked as though Benjamin must surely be guilty. Should they let him go back while they pressed on and saved themselves and the grain? Without a moment's hesitation the stricken group turns to follow the police and the seeming culprit, intent only upon seeing the boy through, guilty as he was. In his time of danger they respond loyally, remembering the suffering father who had dreaded another bereavement. They are no longer the harsh, thoughtless men they were at Dothan.

More than that. Judah, the very one who had proposed the sale of Joseph in the old days, insisted on paying Benjamin's penalty now. He rehearsed the whole story and told of their father's dreadful grief. He begged the feared Egyptian to release the lad and to accept himself, the lion-like leader, as a slave! What a change was here! Joseph could no longer conceal himself from them. With tears of joy he made himself known: freely forgiving them the wrong they had done, overcoming their shame and dread with the assurance of pardon, yea more, of God's guiding hand overruling their very sin and wrath for some larger good.

The Magnanimous Spirit and Sin

Joseph held himself in readiness to forgive. No petty pride held him back from revealing himself as the brother of these wandering foreigners, nor as the former slave whom they had wronged so sorely. He was glad to return good for evil, he was ready and willing to restore them to fellowship and to help them in their need. Yet even he had to wait for signs of penitence, or rather had to do his part to reveal the true repentance that had been growing up within them. There can be no true brotherhood with unrepentant criminals. There can be no fellowship of light with darkness. There can be no effective, healing forgiveness until it is accepted in a like spirit.

So is it with God our Father, Joseph-like in his magnanimous love toward sinners. So is it with Christ our Brother, who gave himself gladly to reconcile us to him. The love of God and the sacrifice of Christ are frustrated by unpentant men. They are not effective until the response of human hearts: penitence is won. Then comes the joy of fellowship restored.

Therefore doth God, like the ruler Egypt, make himself strange toward us dealing with us in ways that humble our pride and stir up our slumbering consciences within us. While we are distressed, perplexed and offended he looking eagerly for the soul's awakening. But "whom he loveth he chasteneth that at the last he may grip our hearts his own great heart of love with mutual zeal and fervor. Just because he cares so much, like Joseph, he cannot overlook the ugly past until he has assured a better future for his own. He is willing to take severe measures, as Joseph was, in order to bring about the desired result. Like Joseph, God is better to us than oftentimes seems to be. Looking backward we often realize that God's wistful smile was underlying the dark cloud that overshadowed us with pain.

We Find Better Than We Seek

The sons of Jacob went down Egypt seeking grain. They found it plenty, but they found something more precious far—brotherhood and love. The brother they sought not had provided in abundance the bread they sought. We are constantly having the same happy surprises, if only our minds are alert in grateful appreciation to realize good things when they come unbidden. By many of us the kingdom of heaven is unexpectedly discovered, like the treasure hidden in a field, of which Jesus spoke in the parables by the sea. Only some are not as wise as the man of the parable, who in his joy was willing to sacrifice everything else to make sure of that treasure.

We are oftentimes driven to God by our need, like the starving prodigal son. We go because we must or we should perish. Then in marvelous grace we find the outstretched arms and the waiting home prepared. We go in fear or hunger, and find the richest of spiritual gifts added unto us. Moreover, in finding Joseph the brothers found again their own better selves, their true inheritance of Abraham and Israel. They were better men because Joseph in loving wisdom had taught them truth. We do we in coming to Jesus "come to ourselves," finding our rightful destiny. He is a brother whose ways toward us are not for his own advantage or pleasure merely, but for the unity of God's family and for the fullest development of every child in his Father's house.

God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform.

A Christmas Program Suggestion

THE Sunday School Section of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief has provided free-for-all Sunday schools a simple but fascinating program which can be used or adapted to the large or small school.

This program presents "The Magi of Today," by Anita B. Ferris. The plan includes an order of service with musical selections from "The Messiah"; songs, "We Three Kings of Orient Are," and "Christians, Lo, the Star Appeareth"; responsive readings, and a presentation of the "Magi."

Fourteen or more intermediate, junior and primary girls and boys are required for the "Magi." These young people take us back to a roadside leading from the east of Bethlehem and to a Christian home in that town. They portray in song, dialogue and action the life of the children and young people of Christ's birthplace, their need of help and the coming of help to them from America, England and the children in every land.

The characters in the presentation of the story are Jack, the son of an Armenian-Syrian Relief Committee worker in Palestine (a fourth-year junior Boy Scout); Mousa and Jacob, sons of a Syrian Christian of Bethlehem, and former schoolmates of Jack (two older junior boys); Rachael, sister to Mousa and Jacob (an elder junior or intermediate girl); Saidah, an Armenian refugee from Bittis (a fifteen- or sixteen-year-old girl from the intermediate department); Miriam, an Armenian refugee who lives with Rachael (an older junior or intermediate girl); Zarmar, sister to Saidah (an intermediate or older junior girl); Samuel, brother to Saidah and Zarmar (a ten-year-old junior boy); Jusuf, baby brother to Saidah, Zarmar and Samuel (a three-, four- or five-year-old boy); Magi of today, five or more representatives of the Sunday schools of the world contributing to the Armenian and Syrian Relief Funds.

These Magi of today come with gifts from many lands for the suffering Armenian and Syrian children. They are:

United States. A Boy Scout, bearing a large flag in one hand; slung over his shoulder is a pack of toys or other gifts, which the boys and girls of America are sharing with the Armenians.

Canada. A Boy Scout bearing a large British flag in one hand and a basket heaped with corn in the other.

Great Britain. Tall girl dressed as Britannia, grasping a British flag in one hand and holding a tray on which rests a loaf of bread in the other.

South America. Tall girl in white Greek costume, with flag of San Martin draped across her (two horizontal bars of blue, separated by a bar of white); blue liberty cap. She carries a tray or basket heaped with wheat.

Russia. A junior girl in Russian peasant costume, such as is worn in affairs in the public schools. She carries a Russian flag in one hand, and in the other a tray on which rests a loaf of bread.

Japan, Korea, China and India. Primary or young junior boys and girls in bright costumes. Each carries a little bowl heaped with cooked rice.

The Islands of the Sea. Primary or young junior girl in simple dress of pale sea-green cheese-cloth, low-necked and sleeveless; wreath of flowers in her hair; her hands full of small flowers as an offering. Her stockings should be dyed to match the costume.

Africa. A small boy with darkened face and hands. He wears a tight-fitting, long-sleeved jacket of brown cambric; a gay cloth about his hips and hanging to his knees brown stockings; no shoes; a bright blanket shawl pinned about his shoulders and thrown back so that it hangs like a cape down his back. He carries a woolen blanket as his gift.

Alaska. Small boy or girl in Eskimo costume offering furs.

Central America, West Indies and Mexico. Small girls wearing black mantillas over their heads; Mexico, a full skirt of green; Central America, one of yellow; West Indies, one of all wear white blouses and sashes of blue knotted about the waist. They carry trays of tropical fruits, such as bananas and oranges.

Send to the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, Sunday School Department, 1 Madison Avenue, New York, for the full program and suggestions. They will be sent free to any school or teacher.

God's Care and Man's Duty

LET us hear the conclusion of the whole matter. Fear God and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man." Eccles. 2:13.

How wonderful is the man that God has made! How wonderful is sight, thought, hearing, memory! Of all the things that he has created, how remarkable are the sun, the moon, the stars, day and night! How beautiful are the flowers in shape, color and fragrance! How profitable it would be if the attention of children were constantly called to God's greatness in so many respects! What subject for thought there is in God's purpose in making the different animals, and in giving to men such different characters and colors and peculiarities and variety of languages! We certainly must believe that God can hear the supplications of men and women wherever they are. How wonderful is his care of them: providing food to eat! How great is the variety of fruit, vegetables and meat!

What a marvelous guide the Ten Commandments are to all of the nations of the world! And they were communicated by God direct to Moses.

God created man in his own likeness and image; and we are told that he wants human beings to share his nature and be spiritual and eternal. How singular it is that the whole world in all ages seems to be trying to live as if there were no God to be obeyed, and so be indifferent to Christ's teaching that "The things that are seen are temporal, and the things that are unseen are eternal!"

How noble people would become if they thought it a privilege to "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," and to have the spirit of Christ, which the Bible encourages us to appropriate! We may, according to the Bible teaching, "know the love of Christ, which passeth understanding, that we might be filled with all the fullness of God." Eph. 3:19. "Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think according to the power that worketh in us, unto him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus throughout all ages, world without end. Amen." Eph. 3:20-21.

In Jer. 17:9 we are taught: "The heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked: Who can know it?" How much we ought to pray and study earnestly to know how we can understand all truth and be more than conquerors!

We are told God loved Solomon, who was David's son. Can we not all, who desire, be loved of God? Is not God willing to use us all as he did Moses who so wonderfully delivered the Israelites from their imprisonment in Egypt? Is not God a great fact, who is waiting to be gracious? Ought we not to profit by Saul's experience, when Jesus called to him, and asked him: "Why persecutest thou me?" And Saul promptly surrendered and asked: "What wilt thou have me to do?" Ought not each of us to have Christ speak to us? Are we not to be heirs of God and joint-heirs with Jesus Christ? What deep meaning there is in the declaration: "For bodily exercise profiteth little: But godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." I Tim. 4:8. What solemn grandeur there is in Paul's instruction: "Whether you eat or drink, or whatever you do, do all to the glory of God!"

J. C. H.

A SIXTEEN-YEAR-OLD boy, with both feet shot off, was wheeled in to hear Dr. Harry E. Fosdick the other night and with shining eyes listened as I never saw anybody listen," writes Miss Willis R. Young, a Y. W. C. A. secretary at one of the base hospitals in France, where she looks after the welfare of our Red Cross nurses. When Dr. Fosdick had finished his "Challenge of the Present Crisis," the boy looked down at his stumps and then at Dr. Fosdick and burst out: "I'm glad it was that part of me and not the top that got busted up!"

Dr. Fosdick looked down at the pale face with the big eyes and said, "You bet! for the man is all there!"

How to heat a church

A new system that abolishes useless waste

UNLIKE a business building, a church's idle hours far outnumber its working ones.

Only some of its rooms are used part of the time but the heating system—big enough for the whole building—must nevertheless be used for these two or three rooms. Think what a waste of precious heat, of precious coal, this means, even if all the other rooms are cut off. Think how many homes could be kept warm and comfortable with the fuel thus wasted.

It is time this waste was stopped. It is depriving the nation's industries and the nation's homes of sorely needed fuel.

Grinnell Ready-Heat is the ideal heating system for churches. It heats just the rooms you need—and no more. It heats them for just as long as they are needed—and no longer.

On Sundays the whole church is thoroughly warmed, but as soon as the congregation has dispersed the heat is turned off. All fuel expense immediately ceases. Quite different from shutting off a furnace half full of good coal. On week-days, when perhaps one or two parlors or classrooms are in use for a few hours, Grinnell Ready-Heat will warm just these rooms and no others.

How to Reduce Your Church Heating Bills

Grinnell Ready-Heat combines the best-known principles of GAS-heating and ventilation. It warms and keeps the air pure at the same time. It operates through independent radiators, which are automatically turned on or off as heating needs require. It costs less to install and less to operate than any other equally efficient heating system.

It is a new and different system. No other gas-heating system offers so many advantages at so small a cost. The savings and added comfort of one year alone will amply justify you in replacing your present costly, wasteful coal-heater with Ready-Heat.

When Johnny has the Croup!

That's a cough with a croupy rattle, so hurry for the Musterole and rub it in right over the chest and neck. How it will tingle at first and then grow ever so cool. And how it will reach in and penetrate right to the spot! It will dissipate all the stuffy congestion which causes that hacking cough.

Why shouldn't grandmother swear by Musterole for colds and coughs? It is better than a mustard plaster—good as that was in the old days. And the explanation is this:

Musterole is made of oil of mustard and other home simples. It penetrates under the skin, down to the part. Here it generates its own heat, and this heat disperses the congestion. Yet Musterole will not blister. Musterole, on the contrary, feels delightfully cool a few seconds after you apply it.

Try Musterole for Bobby and Helen and Dorothy's croup—and for your own cough, too. Try it for rheumatism—it's a regular router out of all congestions. Always keep a jar handy.

Many doctors and nurses recommend Musterole.

30c and 60c jars—$2.50 hospital size.

160 Hens—1500 Eggs

Mrs. H. M. Patton, Waverly, Mo., writes: "I fed 2 boxes of 'More Eggs' to my hens and broke the egg record. I got 1500 eggs from 160 hens in exactly 21 days." You can do as well. Any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called "More Eggs." Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs," and you will be amazed and delighted with results. "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit maker, write E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 2769 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., for a $1 package of "More Eggs" Tonic. Or send $2.25 today and get three regular $1 packages on special fall discount for a season's supply. A million dollar bank guarantees if you are not absolutely satisfied, your money will be returned on request and the "More Eggs" costs you nothing. You take no risk. Write today. Adventures in Neighboring

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

I HAVE just returned, Neighbors, from a brief but joyous visit to a farm not far from New York where there were guinea-pigs to pet, and a big gray cat to stroke, and where a laughing collie dog came bounding to meet me. But these were only a few of the delights.

The attic of this farm was hung with paper bags filled with dried fruits and vegetables; and my hostess explained to me just how she had done the drying. In fact, she took me out to her preserve kitchen—a separate building with every modern convenience—and showed me her drier.

It was all fascinating: even the preserve kitchen being an interesting place to explore, with its handsome fruit jars (pretty enough for any state fair) and its weighted crocks of vegetables in brine. And when we had finished examining it and a few freshly filled jars, we descended into the cool, dark cellar of the house to see where the beauties were stored. Surely, Ali Baba never possessed such a treasure cave as that.

Turning our backs on the family jewel-cabinet, we returned to the farmhouse living-room, where there was an open fire with big logs ablaze. Here we spent the afternoon and evening, with the lamp lighted and the family gathered about. The talk was lively and gay: full of every one's interests, from those of the grandfather to those of the young daughter of the house.

It was a day I shall never forget. "No one really lives, after all," I thought to myself as I slipped off to sleep that night, "except the men, women and children to whom God has granted the privilege of living and working in his out-of-doors."

But, fellow adventurers, on the following day I was reminded of the reverse of that picture. For I spent the day driving about the countryside; and as I got farther and farther from that progressive farm, with its comforts and its nearness to the railroad, I came upon the loneliest of little farms. Even here I found only brave souls, smiling faces. "Go back to city life? Not much!" And yet what loneliness was confessed to!

In some districts there were no community interests whatsoever. There were little clubs or "circles"; plucky little clubs, too, managing to sew a lot for the Red Cross despite the demands of farm work. But these clubs, apparently, never had a joint meeting. So each farm family knew only a few near neighbors.

THIS set me to thinking. I wondered if many of you, my Christian Herald Neighbors, lived in a community which had small clubs but no big, all-inclusive club: nothing to unify the whole region. Doubtless many of you do, since little clubs naturally spring up in the country, while a community organization is harder to start. Perhaps many of you are members of some small club, and have just helped start it up again for the winter.

If so, won't you, this winter, make an effort to broaden it and expand it so as to include every one? Or else, keeping it a little club for everyday neighborliness, won't you, then, help your community to start some organization—anything at all—which shall meet once or twice a month and be for the whole region? This can be a literary society or a spelling school or a community choral club or a Saturday debate. The possibilities are endless. What you choose doesn't matter. The thing that matters—as the following fine letters testify—is the need in every rural community of something of the sort, and the need of getting it started now!

Literary Society for Entire Community

The first years of our married life my husband and I spent in the wooded country of northern Minnesota. We were ten miles from a town and five miles from the nearest church. Our home was on the shore of a beautiful lake, our business prosperous, and our neighbors kind; but we gradually began to feel the lack of social life. One becomes narrow and blue when there is nothing to go to. Ten miles is too far to drive of an evening when one has been working hard all day and with horses that are tired. So we asked ourselves: "Why couldn't we have some form of social gathering with those who lived near us?"

The district school teacher boarded with us one winter, and the subject of a literary society for the whole community was discussed. She talked it over with her pupils and found them wildly enthusiastic. A meeting was called, to which everybody was invited to come. We made up our minds from the first that this was to be a community affair. The school children should help; but it must not be left entirely to them. Every one in the neighborhood was to be urged to take part.

After the society was properly organized, we set out to prepare for our next meeting; and all of the native tact and ability possessed by the three members of the program committee were called into play to make it a success.

School children could learn pieces and dialogues, rehearse them to their heart's content, and then deliver their parts. Not so with us older people. The older people must give for our programs something they already knew; and it was up to us to find out what each one's accomplishments were. When we had gathered for a meeting, one member of our committee, pencil in hand, would go the rounds of the room, getting the names of all who would contribute to our evening's program. We would then choose some easy subject for debate, appoint two leaders, and have them take their places on opposite sides of the room. They chose sides as they would for a spell-down. Each person gave one point in favor of his side of the argument, and these were given alternately back and forth, as in a spelling-match. Each speaker rivaled the last in wit and repartee, and we usually wound up with a roar of laughter.

There are always lots of jolly good songs going the rounds of the lumber camps, so we never failed to prevail upon some woodsman to produce a selection. One Frenchman kindly gave us a song in his native tongue.

We housewives racked our brains for recitations of our school-girl days, and everything that could be remembered was brought forth, from "Bessie's Three Lovers," by Will Carleton, to "Auntie Doleful's Visit."

The school children made a specialty of dialogues, and seemed to revel in elaborate costumes.

We edited our "weekly paper," of course, and found that the countryside was vibrating with poetry. In nearly every issue some new author produced a lyric of startling rhythm. We had one novel thing at our meetings: a question box. Each one present was asked to put in a question before the meeting began. The person having charge of this box for the evening read the question to the audience, asking any one who could to answer. If no one was able to, the writer of it was supposed to answer it himself.

No one was ever criticized for lack of talent. When the spring came and our society was dropped for the summer, we looked back on a winter of solid enjoyment. However we might differ in religious or other views, we had found one common ground on which we could be neighbors. The children had had a splendid time. We found that a spirit of friendliness and sociability had been promoted in the community which would last through the years.—Mrs. P. G. KIBBEY.

Isn't that a delightful account, Neighbors?

OUR second Adventure tells of a community organization which was not only enjoyable and jolly, but practical and instructive as well.

Community Club for Study

With the idea that country people are largely responsible for their environments, a school teacher began talking up, among the neighbors, gatherings at the various homes for the winter months. The scheme was well received, her family entertaining for the first time. It was decided that the club should meet every alternate Friday evening at seven o'clock.

This was the beginning of our study club. It included every one in the region: ten to twelve families attending the meetings. Each time a plain supper, consisting of something like bread and butter, beans or salad, cake and coffee, would be ready to serve when the guests arrived; plates being held on lap-boards. This supper was always jolly. After it came the program; and this was followed

Get More Eggs
On Less Feed

Egg prices this winter will undoubtedly be the highest in the world's history. Those who know how to feed to get winter eggs will reap enormous profits, while improper methods mean a loss.

Prof. T. E. Quisenberry, one of the world's greatest poultry authorities and President of the American Poultry School, Box 1012, Leavenworth, Kansas, has issued a 16-page bulletin on "How and What to Feed For Heavy Egg Production and to Cut the Cost of Feed." This Bulletin will be mailed Free to interested readers, while they last. Hundreds of hens fed and cared for under Prof. Quisenberry's direction have laid 200 to 298 eggs per year, while the normal production according to U. S. Government reports is 60 to 80 eggs per year. Adventures in Neighboring by the social hour, the children having a separate room for that.

For our program, the first two years, we had the Cornell University Farm Extension Course. The next year we studied trees, starting with evergreens and finishing up with the deciduous trees found in central New York State. These programs were simple and attractive, but practical; so even the children learned to know the data of the trees they saw.

Our third winter we took up the study of all the native birds. For this we used some books in the school library, bird bulletins, any outside literature we could get, and (most important of all) our own observations from nature. Such study is a great pleasure. One has no idea how interesting the birds are—the very commonest birds—until after learning about them. Every one in the club became very enthusiastic over that part of New York State through observing the birds, flowers, trees and soil. If there is a community where people don't care about the place, some one ought to start a study club there.

Our fourth year we studied English Literature, reading a lot and reciting. This was all good. We became acquainted with books we had never read; and the reading habit grew.

Throughout those years we were always having some entertainment on a holiday. We gave a play, had some Halloween socials, and held a Washington's Birthday party. We always had music. Finally the club became so well liked that no one would miss a meeting if well enough to go. Our meetings ended early; we went home at ten. And there were no fees! The families did not mind entertaining, for they in turn were entertained.—Miss A. G. BOWER.

I will not pause to comment on that fine experiment, but will hurry on to our next one, which occurred in Ohio.

Here a comment is necessary. For I could not publish this adventure without expressing the regret I felt, when I read it, that this novel system of valuable clubs was only for women. It should have been for the men and children as well.

APART from this defect, the following plan is ideal; and it would be simple enough for any one following this plan to build on the broader idea: that of including the whole family.

Local Community Clubs Federated as State System

Some years ago we were living in a community which, it seemed to me, needed a Farm Women's Club. It was a very fertile region, and that community's chief interest was the grabbing and snatching of dollars. There was almost nothing to make life worthwhile.

I had been hearing, off and on, about certain women who were very energetic and wide-awake. She had a reputation for "caring things through." So I hunted her up. I found her not only brilliant but wealthy, and eager to help; and I took her into my confidence.

Together we divided the community around a small town into quarters (in our mind: with a club for each and the town as center for community upbuilding. She was organized in her corner, and I in mine, and between us we were to organize the other two.

I went right at it with the heart and will to win. First, I got one of the most influential women in my locality interested, and I invited all the neighbors to her home one afternoon. While the ladies were busy with their knitting and crochet, I addressed them on the hopes of the meeting, and we proceeded to organize, electing our hostess chairman. Our aim was to study free Agriculture. Bulletins on woman's side of the farm work consider the needs of our community in ways to help it; and discuss together our individual home problems, so as to help each other.

As a result of that first effort, we not only saw our whole plan for the four clubs become a reality, but a prominent farm paper of our state took up the work, and the last I heard had nearly one hundred of those community clubs federated in the state with an annual meeting at the State Fair, where each member was recognized by her badge and made to feel at home in that throng. Now those clubs are doing Red Cross work in connection with the main objective.

This is only a suggestion, therefore, of what one can do if one will think out and follow careful plan for helping the community; it is a statement of what has actually been done. Try it out for yourself! You will find wide-awake folks ready to give it a boost.—LEONA DIX BARNES.

I had hoped, Neighbors, to include several more of these fine accounts, but there is not room this week. So shall save the other letters, and use them in another community-club number after the Christmas holidays. Do not forget, by the way, that the number after this one is to be a second "Christmas number." Be sure to wait for it.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THE Week of Prayer, covering the eight days including the second and third Sundays of the year, has long been a growing factor in the work of evangelical Christianity. The growth of the spirit of unity among the churches, the beginning of many seasons of gracious blessing in evangelism, a wider tolerance and a deeper sympathy, all these have come hand in hand with the spread of the observance of the Week of Prayer toward universal custom. It is the rule rather than the exception now that, wherever possible, churches in city neighborhoods, and in the smaller towns all the churches, should unite in their observance of this week of prayer, the Congregational and Baptist deacons, the Presbyterian elders, the Methodist class leaders and the Episcopal vestrymen uniting their petitions for an outpouring of grace. And the promise to the "two or three who ask in My name" is more than fulfilled where Christians thus sink their differences in unity of spirit.

We published in the issue of November 13 a series of topics for the Week of Prayer, suggested by the World's Evangelical Alliance. The Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America has suggested the use of the same topics with some minor modifications. Thus all of Protestantism under the two Anglo-Saxon flags will be united in its approach to the Source of all spiritual power. From Australia and New Zealand, all the way around the trail of the rising sun to Hawaii and the Pacific Isles, wherever the Union Jack or the Stars and Stripes fly and free people worship, there will ascend the incense of souls united in humble supplication. As you kneel on January 6 to thank God for all his great deliverances, for his manifest calls to unity, for the prayer answered and his purposes made clear as you pray for humility, for a fuller revelation of his will for yourself, for deeper faith and a wider hope, you will be strengthened by the knowledge that in these two wide empires of liberty, thousands of all faiths unite with you adding their petitions to yours, their faith to yours, and sharing your hope. It is not too early, in these first days of December, to begin to organize your church and your community for the spiritual observance of this week, separated by Protestant Christendom for Prayer and Praise.

Prayers are requested as follows:

Eight ask prayer for bodily healing for themselves and one each for a cousin, a daughter, a nurse, a minister's wife, a babe and a soldier. These petitioners ask for improvement in general health, recovery from unnamed physical defects, from an operation, from nasal catarrh, heart disease, lung trouble, paralysis, goiter and deafness.

Eleven ask prayer for conversion of husbands; six for sons; two for granddaughters and one each for a brother, children, nephew and a family of brothers.

Five ask prayers for healing of the mind. Eleven ask blessings for themselves—specifically, that a cloud of worry may be lifted and that spiritual light and faith may be given them and grace to bear trials.

Four ask blessings for others. These blessings are requested for our soldiers and sailors and for our brave allies, also for husbands and children, and one for a lady who is a slave to drink.

One asks prayer for the banishing of the saloon; one for a spiritual awakening among the young; one that an evangelist may be sent to a certain community; three for revival in churches, and one for a good minister.

A Week in the World's News

cept the roll of executive agents of the Reich. As a result of this friction it was announced that the information regarding plans for registration on January 2 and 3 on February 2 was incorrect, nothing yet being decided. The Reds were said to be seeking to secure the reins of power before the return of the soldiers from the front, these apparently being considered a conservative element. The position of the Berlin Reds to the holding of a constituent convention was based also on their fear that such a convention would be controlled and organized by the conservative, intellectual and land-owning classes and the fruits of the revolution thus be taken from the people. This attitude was shared by the south German states. On November 24 movements for secession were marked in Bavaria and Saxony and in the Rhine provinces. A North German public had also been proclaimed on that day, embracing Oldenburg, Oestfriesland, Bremen, Hamburg and Schleswig-Holstein, with its capital at Hamburg. It was not clear, at this writing, whether this public was formed because of the radicalism of the Berlin Reds, or because the Soldiers' and Workmen's councils in Bremen and Hamburg, which had declared their sympathy with Russian Bolshevism, were impatient with Herr Ebert's moderation. The Ebert Government has declared its intention to disestablish the Church. Various measures were raised in Germany against the establishment of a socialist autocracy in place of the autocracy of Wilhelm, and Herr Ebert warned that Allied relief of food shortage depended on the establishment of a democratic government. The German revolution of November 24 had dethroned and deprived of titles 278 persons. As we went to press there were rumors that the radical elements had seized the power in Berlin. The new German-Austrian Republic organized at Vienna was reported on November 18 to have addressed President Wilson, expressing hope that in accordance with his principles he would support the desire of the Germans in Austria to effect a union with Germany.

SERBIA RE-ESTABLISHED. On November 18 the Serbian Government was transferring departments from the island of Corfu to Belgrade, all of Serbia being freed of invaders while Serbian troops were in occupation of the former territory of Austria-Hungary inhabited by Serbians.

THE COSTS OF CONFLICT. Official British figures show that their losses in the war total 3,665 killed, 2,032,122 wounded, 359,145 sons and missing. The German casualties are 1,580,000 killed, over 4,000,000 wounded, 1,000 taken prisoners and 260,000 whose fate was not known. No statement has been made of the French losses. In ships America lost during the whole course of the war 145 vessels of 354,449 tons, 775 lives being lost in the vessels. In the air fighting on the western front in France the Americans destroyed 926 German planes and 73 balloons, losing themselves 265 airplanes, 38 balloons. The time the armistice was signed, America had in service 740 airmen, 744 pilots, 457 observers and 23 aerial gunners.

KOLCHAK DICTATOR IN SIBERIA. Because the radical tendencies of certain members of the all-Russian government at Omsk, Siberia, Admiral Kolchak, with the support of the majority of the Council of Ministers, organized a coup d'etat on November 19 and became virtual dictator and commander of the all-Russian army and fleet. The Premier retained his post and his authority. The action of Admiral Kolchak was reported to be approved in Washington and reports indicated that it was being accepted by the various governments in Siberia and Russia allied against the Bolsheviks. Cossack troops under General Denikine, on November 20, overran the Skoropadski Government set up by the Germans in the Ukraine and captured the city of Kiev. The Bolsheviks appeared to have concentrated their forces against the Americans and British south of Archangel. A determined attack was reported as having been made on November 11, after a bombardment by gunboats on the river Dvina. Although the front line positions of the Allied troops were penetrated, the attack was ultimately repelled with great loss to the Bolsheviks. At the time their capital was taken by the Cossacks, the Ukrainians were fighting in Austrian Galicia to prevent the extension of Bolshevik influence in that province which is aimed by both sides, and were also reported as showing hostile intentions toward Finland.

DUTCH RADICALS FAIL. The attempt on the part of radical elements in Holland to return the monarchy on November 20 proved to have been a complete failure. Queen Wilhelmina drove abroad amid universal expressions of loyalty. The people who attended the mass meetings wore the orange-colored sashes which marked them as loyal to the queen. However Holland may feel about its own Queen, it was reported to be growing exceedingly impatient at the presence of the Kaiser within the borders of the Netherlands, and while the best French authorities on international law were agreed that there was no way to extradite the Kaiser, it appeared possible, on November 20, that the British and French governments would make representations to the Dutch governments regarding its protection of the former Emperor.

RELIEF FOR HUNGRY EUROPE. On November 19 ships carrying 200,000 tons of food for the populations of northern France, Belgium and Austria left American ports for Gibraltar and Bristol Channel ports in England. The boats sailed subject to orders from Mr. Hoover, who was then on his way to Europe, and who would later order them to ports where their cargoes were most needed. In Chicago, on November 19, it was reported that 1,500,000 cans of condensed milk, purchased from the Queen Elizabeth Fund, had been sent to Belgium to save Belgian babies. It was estimated that 250,000 children were left helpless, their parents having been deported by the Germans. In order to make certain that the cargoes of food required abroad would be available, the Food Administration planned to make the first week of December a Food Conservation Week. While the most notable restrictions have been removed from American foodstuffs, the nation will still need to save, to waste nothing, and to satisfy its own appetite with the constant thought in mind that waste here means want abroad.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The United War Work Campaign closed on Wednesday, November 20, after having been extended for two days. The total subscriptions reported were $158,565,058, or about $12,000,000 less than the budget that the American people were asked to contribute. It was expected, however, that subscriptions not reported, and additional subscriptions made after the close of the campaign would bring the total over the mark. China subscribed $1,200,000. On November 25 it was stated that the full amount had been raised. . . . The testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee investigating the Brewster's Shush Fund developed on November 20 and 21 that there had been peculiarly close relations between the representatives of the Brewster's and members of Count von Bernstorff's propaganda organization. It was also brought out that certain concerns had been blacklisted because they insisted that their employees be total abstainers. Each of these concerns was demonstrated with by the brewers' organization, and, proving obdurate, was put on the "Don't Patronize" list. Among these concerns were the Cadillac Automobile Company, the Packard Motor Company, the Reo Company, the Procter & Gamble Soap Company, the Sherwin Williams Paint Company, H. J. Heinz, who is 57 varieties of a prohibitionist, Rogers, Peet & Co., the Western Union Telegraph Co. and the Wanamaker Stores. . . . October, the last month of the submarine war, cost the Allied and neutral countries 93,000 tons of shipping. . . . Postmaster Gen. Burleson, on November 20, announced that the Western Union and Postal Telegraph companies under the government control would be operated as one concern after December 1. The Postal Company declared its intention to resist this action in the courts. . . . Former Premier Asquith, the leader of the Liberal party in Parliament, on November 18, declared the plans for British elections to be a blunder and a calamity. He said the nation was united under the coalition government and deplored the raising of any political question. . . . Frank P. Walsh, joint Chairman with Wm. H. Taft, of the War Labor Board, sent his resignation to President Wilson on November 19, but was urged to remain during the period of reconstruction. . . . The former Cunarder, Campania, once Queen of the Seas and the fastest ship afloat, since the beginning of the war in service with the British navy, was sunk in collision with a battleship on November 21, during a gale in the Firth of Forth. . . . The Red Cross announced, on November 20, that it would turn its activities from bandages and hospital supplies to the making of garments needed by the people in the reclaimed districts of France and Belgium, and to the repairing of the lighter garments of the soldiers. . . . The Loans of the nation during the war were $17,852,000,000. The First Liberty Loan produced $2,000,000,000, the Second Loan $3,808,000,000, the Third Loan $4,176,000,000, the Fourth Loan $6,989,047,000, and War Savings Stamps $879,000,000. . . . According to the report of the United States Public Health Service, the fatalities from influenza in 46 cities totaled 82,306, while it was declared possible that the deaths in the military camps would nearly equal the number of men killed in actual battle in France, or in the neighborhood of 40,000. . . . The second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, which began December 3, 1917, was adjourned November 21 at 5 P. M. The next session will convene December 2. . . . The American Navy in 1920, if all plans are carried out, will consist of 800 ships, of which 24 will be dreadnoughts. In 1917 our navy had about 300 ships. . . . The Senate Finance Committee, revising downward the proposed Revenue Bill, on November 22 dropped the suggested taxes on luxuries and on gasoline and reduced the impost to be levied on tobacco. . . . Mr. John D. Ryan resigned on November 22 as Second Assistant Secretary of War in charge of Aircraft Production. . . . The Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections on November 22 dropped its investigation into the alleged disloyal speech of Senator La Follette at St. Paul.

Religion and the Soldier

THE best evidence that I have had of the cry for religion on the part of the soldier was when I was working just back of the lines with a group of engineers. These men were just normal, ordinary men, but they came to me, asked for a Bible class, asked for a regular Sunday service (the chaplain was located in another part of France, with another part of this same regiment), and then asked for the communion service. That service was the best I ever officiated at. The plate was only the cover of an old mess kit. The cup was the ordinary mess-kit cup. But the symbolism was there and the spirit was there. Men of every faith partook of the communion that morning. I have officiated since, but never under quite such circumstances, or with quite such a spirit as at that service within range of the guns.

A tall mule-skinner came to me one day while I was at a certain machine-gun battalion and showed me his Testament. It was well worn. He said he had read it through many times, not because he was a saint, but because, somehow, the thing he needed he found there. He said he had never read the words of Jesus with as much understanding as he read them up there on the actual fighting-line. And he added that most of the men read their Testaments far more than one would realize. They are not fond of displaying their religion, but it's there just the same.

Christian Herald, Bible House, New York, N. Y.

"The gift that gave our boy the greatest happiness"

MANY thousands of parents will tell you that The American Boy magazine is the best liked Christmas gift! It lasts all the year, providing constantly returning friends for your boy, cultivating in his impressionable mind a taste for the best reading prepared by men who know boys; who know not only what they should read but what they will read! The American Boy is unlike any other publication and its boy-building policy is heartily endorsed by Y. M. C. A. secretaries, librarians, religious authorities, and the most distinguished educators. It is read by over 500,000 boys each month.

THE AMERICAN BOY

molds your boy by raising his ideals, quickening his ambition and correctly fixing his standards. Stories are clean and wholesome and carry a good moral, but do not preach. They stir a boy to think and show skill, courage and resourcefulness. It is a powerful influence for positive good! From cover to cover every issue will appeal to fathers and mothers!

Departments instruct in electricity, manual training, science, photography, hunting, trapping, fishing, woodcraft, zoology, bird study—and, everything made plain by hundreds of photographs and drawings. Your boy will find constant delight in Dan Beard's monthly page about the outdoors and A. Neely Hall's page "For Boys to Make."

Next year's program is the biggest and broadest in The American Boy's nearly 20 years of publication. It covers the wide world—everything the modern, growing boy should read and know about.

Realize what The American Boy can be to your boy, then send in his subscription, beginning with the sparkling 1918 Christmas number. Or, subscribe for some boy you want to help.

Why Be Thin and Frail?

CAN make you weigh what you should. Can build up your strength. Can improve your figure. Can teach you to stand and walk correctly. In home. Without drugs. By scientific methods, as your physician approves. Results will be ceaseable to you and your friends in a few weeks.

One pupil writes: "Under your treatment I gained 15 pounds in three months and became strong and healthy. I would not be back where I was for any amount of money."

You only realized how easy, how easily, how insistently your weight decreased, your figure improved, and your health improved. I am certain you would write me. I want to help you as only a man can. I've had a wonderful experience over sixteen years. Write me and if my work won't I will tell you what will.

together. "Don't you care, Gabriel," said Madge. "You'll win next week."

IN the dark eyes raised to hers was the settled anguish of something far more tragic than the loss of any spelling-match. "Seventeen cents would have saved my little sister's life," he said steadily. "Only seventeen."

The girls caught a horrified breath. "Won't you tell us?" asked Miriam. Her gentle sympathy opened the boy's heart, and he poured forth the story.

"You Americans do not know what it is to be an Armenian," he burst out. "We live always under a shadow, wondering only when the great, crushing hammer will fall. Five years ago I came here with my father, he make money fast"—Gabriel's careful English was slipping away from him in his excitement—"and he send it every month to the old country for my little mother, and the four younger children. Always he plan to bring them over here, but my mother says always that Repega—what you call Rebecca—is too young to travel. Then comes the war, and nobody shall escape from my country any more. We do not hear, and do not hear, and my father he is nearly wild all the time. He try to send money, but your great United States post-office, even they are afraid of the Turk. 'No good send in war-time,' they say. Then a month ago there is my uncle escaped through Russia to tell us."

"He said my mother has been living with him in our village, though there was never enough and no money came. But one day came those cruel ones and drove my whole village out of their homes."

MADGE looked at Miriam with incredulous horror. Could such things happen? Miriam's lips formed the word, "Deportations."

Gabriel swept on over the interruption. "Days of that, and then they were all driven out with whips and must walk in the desert. My mother often carried Repega, who was hungry and cried all the time."

"There is much I cannot tell you—but one night my uncle heard that two days' journey ahead there is a relief station with food and shelter. They walk all night and all the next day, what is left of my village, and always my mother drops behind because Repega is so heavy and so tired. So when at night they come last to the door, my mother is no more herself—Repega is no longer with her."

"They send my uncle to America to get money over here. Only seventeen cents a day to save each one, but there were not seventeen cents for my one little sister. My uncle knows the way now to send money through a Relief Committee in New York, and my father and all the men in the shop they send always half their wages. I work nights, too, and I have no longer any lunch since my uncle came and told us. But that will not help my little sister now—only the sister of somebody. My little brother Hohannis must come here after the war, and my mother—if indeed she lives—"

DOWN went Gabriel's head again. Miriam's gray eyes were full of tears. "You're class president, Madge, can't you do something?" But Madge had already decided.

"Listen here, Gabriel," she said. "I know what we can do. I'll call a class meeting at half-past one and tell them all about it. They'll adopt Hohannis, I know they will. I guess a hundred freshmen can scare up five cents a month apiece. Here's my seventeen cents now . . . oh!" She caught Miriam's eye in sudden utter shame.

"Why, Gabriel," Miriam said in her lovely slow voice, "why didn't you tell us before? We shall all want a share in making a new little American!"

Your class in high school, or in the church school, can do the same for some other little brother. Write to the Sunday school department of the American Committee for Relief in the Near East, 1 Madison Avenue, New York City.

GENCO

See him smile!

YOUR fighting man smiles when the Quartermaster lets him have a GENCO Safege. It's what he's been waiting for. It's an evolution in razor-making.

Built like the GENCO professional razor—a razor such as all barbers use—it has a single, lasting blade. This is ingeniously equipped with a guard, making the razor safe to shave with anywhere—on a swerving train, a lurching ship, or at the front under fire. Simply by flipping back the guard, the GENCO Safege can be cleansed without running water. You can strop it on the palm of your hand.

Both the GENCO professional and the GENCO Safege razors require no new blades and hence save steel and money. Both possess the famous GENCO edge. Both have low first-costs and no upkeep expense. Both have that concave grind and bevelled edge which enable you to shave yourself with the workmanlike speed and satisfaction of a barber.

Your complete satisfaction with our razors is guaranteed. "GENCO Razors must make good or we will."

Whatever your favorite type of razor—standard blade or safety—there is a GENCO for you, good for a lifetime, economical, and ready to shave you so quickly and so smoothly that you will prize it like an heirloom.

Drop in at your dealer's. Learn what has been achieved by Americans at razor-making.

Young People's Topics for December 15

How I Was Won to Christ

Epworth League Topic. John 1:40-42;
Acts 4:33; 5:42; Phil. 4:3

MOST young Christians in the Church today have grown into their faith in Christ with the passing of the years. Raised in Christian homes, regular attendants at Sunday school, inducted early into Junior or Senior League, they have known faith all their lives, and acceptance of Christ as Saviour has come as the logical result of this training. Such doubts as may have tested their faith have assailed a citadel well defended, and have strengthened what, under other conditions, they might have destroyed. While such a coming to Christ has all the advantages of clean living and purity of soul, those who have thus gained faith may sometimes lack the confident assurance of personal salvation which comes through a sudden turning from sin. There is a tendency for some who have grown up in the church to have a purely intellectual faith which does not reach the inner recesses of the heart. Many who have been trained in the Gospel from their youth have found themselves suddenly face to face with the question of their relation to Christ, perhaps as a result of an evangelistic meeting, or through an intimate talk with their pastor, or through a mother's prayer, unexpectedly overheard. Perhaps one who has strayed far from Christ and his teachings may have found himself in some great meeting, rising to his feet and stepping forward in the aisle with hundreds of others similarly stirred, gradually approaching either an evangelist's outstretched hand or a group who kneel at the mercy-seat. Started upon impulse, he has felt decision growing in his soul as he went forward. Another may have simply yielded his heart to Christ under the influence of a friend's pleading. However we have come to Christ, the majority of us must admit that a mother's faith is the greatest element in our later decision, and the influence of the church and the Sunday school are a close second.

But the question how we were won to Christ is not the greatest question in our life. Many people make the mistake of living all of their Christian life in the atmosphere of the day of their conversion. Having started to walk in the new way, we walk worthily only when we bring others into the path we tread. Witness the references for this lesson. All of them refer not so much to the manner in which individual Christians were brought to Christ as to the way in which, having found him, they sought to bring others to know him. The disciples ceased not to teach or to preach Jesus Christ, whether in the temple or in the house. The risen Saviour and salvation through his name was the burden of their conversation and the central element of their life.

Winning Non-Protestant Aliens

B. Y. P. U. Topic. John 3:3

THE war has to a large degree eliminated the alien problem, and the man or woman of foreign birth has gained through it a new vision of what America means. He or she has ceased to be alien in thought, and even in speech. It is too soon yet to tell what religious result may come with this change in mental outlook. Before the war, there were a great many Italian and French, but principally Italian, immigrants out of touch with organized Christianity who came to America. The only Church they had known had failed to show sympathy with the ideals of the Italian people, while the same Church in France by resisting disestablishment and its attitude toward all things liberal had estranged many of its people. They had known only the Church, but had failed to gain comprehension of the Christ; and while having the same hunger that all men have for spiritual truth, they neither knew how to express it nor did they have an attitude of mirr favorable to recognition of the truth. Also a great many Jewish immigrants came to America somewhat lacking loyalty to the Hebrew Church, but fleeing from oppressions that made the Christ rather a monster than a Saviour. A great many churches faced this problem. They could only recommend Christ to these people by giving the unselfish service along social and philanthropic lines, consequently the church became social centers and evening schools. Night classes in English as in common branches, taught by consecrated Christians, often at much sacrifice of time and strength, have evinced the spirit of Christ and have helped lead those who have learned our tongue into a comprehension of our faith. Many Jews after coming to this country have profited by the social service work of the Church and have ultimately come to believe in the Christ in whose name it was rendered. Thousands have believed who have not declared the faith, but many have acknowledged Christ, and nearly all of the Protestant churches now have well-founded Italian congregations in every center where sons and daughters of Italy are to be found.

Power of the Cross in the Philippines

Christian Endeavor Topic. Ps. 72:1-

WHEN Dewey cut the cable between America and the bonds of Spanish dominion at the same time back 1898, the Philippines consisted of a large body of islands completely surrounded by ignorance, superstition and commercial and religious tyranny. But with the flag of the free flying over the archipelago, American Christendom saw a new obligation and embraced a challenging opportunity. American riflemen and bayonets pacified the islands, but American missionaries and school teachers replaced the power of military force with the power of personal service, and today a new generation of the Philippines has so far advanced in education and ability that it feels competent to govern itself. The headhunter has been transformed into a merchant or peaceful farmer, and the wretched Filipino has been changed into an industrious citizen. The Philippines gave free play to every force that the churches could muster for good and the result is one for which all Christians must well give thanks, since it has vindicated both American missions and American governmental efficiency. The power of the nation, plus the power of the Cross, has made a new Philippines.

When Your Heart's in Your Mouth-

Then is when Tire Chains prove their Real value—they add so much to your brake power. Without them brakes would be useless.

It's these unexpected emergencies that make a driver think quick and act like lightning. When suddenly the children dash out from the pavement and are almost under your wheels before you realize it—you instinctively jam down your foot-brake and frantically grab the emergency.

What if your brakes slipped and didn't hold? Wouldn't the consequences be awful? It's positively criminal for a driver of a motor car to overlook even the slightest safety precaution. Unquestionably the most effective supplementary addition to brake power when the roads and pavements are wet and slippery, is in the use of

WEED TIRE CHAINS

Cars with chainless tires on wet-greasy-slippery pavements lack brake power to the same degree as they would if their brake linings were made of wet-greasy-slippery bands of rubber.

Wet rubber slips—never grips. It slides like a cake of soap on moistened hands. It lacks the bite and hang-on ability of chains.

Good brakes and Weed Tire Chains are undoubtedly the greatest factor in preventing motor accidents.

It's the height of folly to even attempt to drive without chains on all four tires when the roads are slippery and uncertain.

A canal in Venice, now free from the terror and threat of war

How God Saved Venice

The Fate of the Austrians Along the Piave Likened to That of the Egyptians in the Red Sea

By REV. ALEXANDER ROBERTSON, D.D., Venice

THE late Dr. Vaughan, Bishop of Llandaff, lecturing on the Book of Revelation over half a century ago (1862), said: "Learn from this chapter (Ch. 17) that it is not only in God's power to foresee, but that it is his will sometimes to foretell, the occurrences of history, and he has been pleased here to announce to us that there shall not again arise upon earth one colossal power like that of imperial Rome. . . . The time has been, the time may be, when some power shall go far toward realizing, for a moment, the dream of universal empire; but if nothing else, if no arts of negotiation and no combination of hostile armies shall suffice to prevent it, Nature herself in the hands of God shall come to the aid of his prophecy; the conqueror in the moment of his fancied triumph—we speak not without warrant from the past—shall bow to the supremacy of God's elements, and a force which has surmounted every other obstacle shall be dispersed, and, it may be, destroyed."

I have often thought of Bishop Vaughan's words during the course of the war, and they made me confident from the very first that it could only end in one way, as it has now done: in the overthrow of Germany, fighting for universal dominion, and in the triumph of the Allies. Several times, too, his words have been strikingly fulfilled, and in no case more so than in the victory of the Piave. This river—which I know well from source to mouth—flows in separate runs in a white, stony channel from a quarter to a half mile in width. Some of these runs are broad and deep, but they are all easily crossed by boats or hand-bridges. A large contingent of the Austrian army had thus crossed it with guns and ammunition, but with no food supplies, for so confident were they of getting to Venice that the soldiers were told that not only would they get an abundance of food and wine there, but also that each had better provide himself with a small sack in which to put his surplus spoils. Officers provided themselves with huge chests for the same purpose, and motor cars were there to carry the loot to Toblach for railway transport over the Brenner to Austria and Germany.

THEY got to within six and a quarter miles of Venice. It was the moment of their fancied triumph, when "Nature herself in the hands of God came to the aid of his prophecy." Twenty-four hours of rain on the Dolomite Mountains sufficed to bring the Piave River down in floods. It became a rushing, roaring sea of water. Bridges, boats, planks, tree-trunks, all were swept away. Whole battalions of troops crossing were drowned, as the Egyptians were at the Red Sea. Those who had crossed the river were too few to fight their way to Venice; those on the other side could not get to aid them. They were thus caught in a trap, and almost all were either killed or taken prisoners. Venice was saved, and we all thanked God.

Afterward the Austrians and Germans were driven gradually farther and farther from the city. It could no longer be bombarded from the land, but on moonlight nights it was still being bombarded from the air for a time. We were all anxious to return to our homes and work, but, on account of this aerial danger, the admiralty was not yet disposed to allow us, for they were the judges in this matter. Still, those who could show urgent reasons why they should be allowed to return obtained permits. In this way merchants who had in their shops goods more or less perishable were in Venice, also some thousands of poor people who could not afford to live away from their homes because of the expense. Altogether some thirty or forty thousand people were in the city, besides government workmen. There were also soldiers and sailors of all the Allies, comprising not a few Americans, of whom we have not nearly enough.

Nothing delights American soldiers more than to spend any leave they may get in Venice, which is open to them. They can run down to it from the front in a few hours and "The Bride of the Sea," "The Queen of the Adriatic," though in anything but her nuptial and regal dress, still excites their interest and admiration. Upon the whole, the city is now beginning to assume an air of life and activity, and of an evening, when the Piazza San Marco is brilliantly lit up and a military band playing, even an air of gaiety. The time has come when we may put over the sea gateways to Venice, what we often see put up at shop-doors, "Libera Entrata" (Free Entrance)!

There was a time when it would not have been prudent to begin an offensive to drive the enemy out of Venetia, for the Austrian and German forces outnumbered those of the Italians opposed to them, besides which they occupied for the most part higher ground. But Austria had another frontier to defend bordering on Serbia, and she had no troops there. So she had either to withdraw them from Venetia or suffer an invasion that would soon bring her to her knees, and hasten that dismemberment which has now begun by the creation of Slavs, Jugoslavs, and others into independent Kingdoms, who for so long had groaned under her cruel yoke.

AND here again God's word came in to teach us and to give us confidence and peace. All the Allies, and not least among them the United States, have desired the creation of these small democratic kingdoms. And God has decreed their existence. As we learn from the book of Revelation. To quote again from Bishop Vaughan, he shows that the end of a kingdom aiming at universal sovereignty will not be "conquest, but dismemberment"; not "agglomeration, but partition"; not "one kingdom but many kingdoms." "Surely this hath God spoken, and this hath God wrought. Surely if man had been the speaker, he would not

Delegates to the convention which launched the Dry World campaign massed on the steps of the State House at Columbus

World-Wide League for Prohibition

ONE of the most important moral conferences ever held in this country was the one which convened in the interest of the world-wide destruction of the liquor traffic in Columbus, Ohio, November 19-22. The Anti-Saloon League of America called the conference to lay plans for world-wide prohibition, with much better prospect of success than Dr. Russell faced when he founded the League twenty-five years ago. Who then would have predicted a dry America in 1920?

The conference began on Tuesday evening at the Doshier Hotel, with a Thanksgiving and ratification service participated in by stalwart workers from the field and by distinguished delegates representing temperance interests from foreign countries. The official declaration of the purpose of the conference was made by Mr. Ernest Cherrington. This paper was based on three propositions: first, the enlargement of the scope and activities of the Anti-Saloon League of America; second, the giving of substantial assistance to the existing temperance organizations in other countries; and third, the laying of a foundation for creating an International Anti-Alcoholic League formed according to the plan of the Anti-Saloon League of America. This paper and Dr. P. A. Baker's speech, which preceded it, were handed to the delegates in pamphlet form.

Hon. William Jennings Bryan spoke twice before the Conference, commending the world-wide prohibition proposition.

This characteristic letter from Billy Sunday to the conference was read by Wayne P. Wheeler:

The greatest event in human history was the birth of Jesus. The next greatest was the overthrow of Prussian militarism. The next will be the driving of booze into exile. I am with the Anti-Saloon League to the last trench in its efforts to deliver the world from the menace and the power of the rum traffic.

During the session of the Conference, the war prohibition bill was passed by the Senate, and signed by President Wilson.

As the movement is now to be world-wide, profound interest was manifested in the reports of the delegates from foreign countries as to temperance sentiment and organization in their respective fields. Prominent among the number were Canon S. A. Johnston, Rev. Dr. Bingham of Birmingham, Dr. Munro of Glasgow, Scotland, and Cipriano A. Frausto of Mexico. Hon. Ben Spence, Secretary of the Dominion Temperance Alliance of Canada, who has had an important part in driving the liquor traffic out of the Dominion, was inclined to poke a little fun at the United States by saying Canada had beaten it to National Prohibition by both Dominion and local laws, that Australia was rapidly following Canada into the dry column, and that England had made more progress in temperance since the war began than any other part of the world.

The British delegates breathed a spirit of conservatism and caution, insisting that the United States make sure of prohibition in its own territory by adequate enforcement laws, and that reasonable modesty and prudence should be manifested in entering their territory, that the proper cooperation there might be secured.

The delegates from China said that the brewers had already scattered their deadly traffic in that country, but that the people had not yet acquired the drinking habit, and that there was urgent call for the International Anti-Alcohol League, which ought to take its place immediately in that territory to save it from this moral blight.

The most surprising information the Conference received was contained in a communication from Mr. Lawrence Mott, representative of the American Anti-Saloon League in Tokyo, which stated that there was a possibility of Japan adopting nationwide prohibition within a year by parliamentary action.

President Wilson Heads Peace Commission

IT WAS announced at Washington, on November 26, that following his address to Congress on December 2, in which he was expected to make the country rather than the Congress his audience, taking the people into his confidence both as to the reasons for his own action and as to the problems now before the country for solution, the President would sail for France on the transport George Washington, formerly the North German Lloyd liner of that name. It was announced that the other members of the American Peace Delegation and the secretarial staff would sail with the President except Col. House and Gen. Bliss, who are now in Paris, and that America's complete delegation consisted of the President, Col. Edw. M. House, Secretary of State Lansing, former Ambassador to France, Henry White, and Maj. Gen'l Tasker H. Bliss. It was also suggested that Secretary Baker might go to France to replace the President on his return. Henry White, whose home is in Maryland, was appointed as a Republican. He is an experienced diplomat, having been in the diplomatic service since 1883, beginning as Secretary of Legation in Vienna.

London dispatches, of November 28, implied that there would be a preliminary conference, which would make all haste to reach an agreement on the principal matters at issue in order that a preliminary peace treaty might be arranged and the great armies demobilized. After this it was suggested that the minor details would be carefully worked out by various special commissions.

It was expected that President Wilson would remain in France about four weeks, which would mean that he would be gone from the country in the neighborhood of six weeks. He was scheduled to land at Brest, the great American port in France. There he would be met by the French Foreign Minister and the Minister of Marine and escorted by them to Paris, where President Poincaré and Premier Lloyd George of England would await him. It was expected that the Peace Congress would begin its session on December 14, and it was reported on November 27, that there was a possibility that the discussions might be conducted in English instead of French, for many years the language of diplomacy, the proceedings to be printed in both French and English.

The discussions and dispatches in the press indicate day by day more clearly that the League of Nations and the Freedom of the Seas would be the principal questions at issue in the peace conference. Great Britain's supremacy on the sea having contributed in no small degree to the victory of the Allies, it was expected that Britain and her colonies would be slow to agree to any limitation of sea power, while at the same time being equally slow to propose any arrangement which would inaugurate a battle of the ship builders between Britain and the other maritime nations at present in alliance with her.

It was reported that the President had it in mind to propose a League of Nations which should have authority to police the seas, the surrendered German fleet to be made the nucleus of the Naval police force.

The plan also contemplated an arbitration tribunal to which all differences between nations should be submitted, and whose decision should be final. British statesmen were reported to believe that the decree of the League of Nations could be more adequately enforced through the economic boycott than through the action of an international fleet.

Speakers at the Prophetic Conference in Carnegie Hall, New York City, on November 25 to 28, 1918

New York's Prophetic Conference

A Memorable Series of Meetings Addressed by Eminent Students of Prophecy

NEW YORK was never so crowded as at the present time. The hotels, the restaurants, the railroad termini, the streets, the places of amusement, are all filled to overflowing. On the evening of the opening of the Prophetic Bible Conference, it happened that the embargo on the street illuminations had been removed by the Fuel Administrator, and as I walked up Broadway to Carnegie Hall the scene was one of unprecedented brilliance. Never did Vanity Fair appear so entrancing. The restraint of war considerations had disappeared, for was not the armistice signed? Was not peace almost an accomplished fact? Why should not the people feel gay and buoyant?

I began to wonder whether, amid all this gaiety and hunger after material things, our congregation in the Conference might not be a mere handful of Bible students, interested in the tremendous significance of the times in which we are living. My fears, however, if they were fears, were set at rest speedily. Very few minutes after the doors of the great hall were opened every seat was occupied, and for the hundreds that were left outside an overflow meeting was quickly arranged in the nearby Church of the Strangers.

Both with regard to the size of the congregation and the spiritual quality of the meeting, the Conference must have been regarded by the conveners as an unequivocal success. As I scanned the faces of those nearest to me, I saw upon them a strange unearthly light, such as is only seen on the faces of those keyed up to a keen, eager expectancy that something momentous is about to happen. These were not people who had simply, by a process of mental exercise, arrived at a logical conclusion as to some theory; they were men and women possessed by and exalting in a glorious fact.

Mr. Charles M. Alexander was present as song leader. Mr. Alexander can sing, and he can lead singing; but his greatest gifts are certain deep, profound psychological intuitions that never seem to fail him in judging just what to sing, when to sing and how to sing it, to produce the right effect. He was assisted by a trio of musicians who contributed largely to the success of all the meetings.

THE first address of the Conference was given by Dr. Arno C. Gaebelin of New York City, on "The Pre-eminence of the Lord Jesus Christ, and His Coming Glory." The address was based on Col. 1:15-18, and dealt with the sevenfold pre-eminence of Christ as Creator, as Sustainer of the universe, as the subject of revelation, as the Risen Man, as the Creator of the spiritual man, as the Redeemer of man, and as the coming King.

Dr. Torrey, the long-time associate of the late D. L. Moody, was at his best as he discoursed on "That Blessed Hope!" He began by pointing out that the Conference was held at a most opportune time. When the program was made out, the committee had no idea that an armistice would be so quickly signed by the contending powers. It was signed, however, and multitudes of people were immediately filled with all kinds of fantastic hopes, which were doomed to inevitable disappointment. There is only one hope that will not be so doomed, because it is built in the sure foundation of God's Word, and that is the Blessed Hope of the Lord's return. The points made by Dr. Torrey as to the coming of Christ were: first, it will be a personal coming; second, a visible and bodily coming; third, a future coming; fourth, a coming with great publicity; fifth, a triumphant coming. Every point was illustrated in the speaker's well-known and emphatic style, and his closing challenge was most effective. "Would you be glad if the sound of His approach suddenly burst upon you? Honest, now, would you? It is not a Blessed Hope unless you would."

THE second day of the conference began with a meeting in the Marble Collegiate Church, at which another large crowd gathered, filling the building one hour before the time of opening. The first address was a very scholarly effort, delivered by the Rev. Lewis Sperry Chafer, on "The Crowns of the Lord Jesus Christ." The Rev. Leon Tucker followed on the subject, "God's Purpose as Revealed in the Holy Scriptures."

The afternoon meeting of the second day in Carnegie Hall was presided over by Rev. Dr. Otto F. Bartholow of Mount Vernon, N. Y., one of the most valiant champions of evangelical truth in the east, and whose success as a Bible teacher is evidenced by the fact that his Men's Sunday Morning is one of the largest in the country, having a membership of over fourteen hundred. Dr. Bartholow delighted his audience by his introductory speech, which, though only occupying a few minutes, was full of thrills. He spoke of two things he had experienced in recent years, a conviction, and a conversion. The former had reference to his belief in the premillennial doctrine, which he frankly and enthusiastically avowed. As to his conversion, he had been trained in a Methodist Theological Seminary to preach the post-millennial gospel, and when he entered the ministry he preached against premillennialism. But there came a time when, after prayerful study of the subject, a light broke in upon him, and he discovered that he had been preaching error. He forthwith resolved to change his course. He began by getting ten of his men together and opening out to them his new gospel. That was the beginning of his famous Bible class. Then he gathered the women of his church together and preached the same truth to them, until now he has a class of seven hundred women.

Somewhat in contrast to Dr. Bartholow's confession of faith in premillennialism, came the next speaker, the Rev. Dr. D. J. Burrell, with an equally frank avowal that he did not quite know where he stood on the question. It would have chilled his hearers had he not said it so genially, and followed it by a rapturous shout, "But I know He's coming. My Lord is coming, and I shall see Him face to face!" Although Dr. Burrell was down on the program to speak on "The Confirmation of Scripture in History and Current Events," he quickly disavowed any ability to interpret prophecy. "All real prophecy," he said, "is characterized by a general vague indefiniteness which makes it difficult to secure the right perspective. But as in a Japanese picture there is a similar vagueness, there is always seen a mighty mountain as the background, so, whilst I cannot undertake to interpret prophecy, I see behind it the towering mountain fact of God's presence and power."

Sandwiched between Dr. Burrell's and the next address came the reading of a cable message from the Prophetic Conference in Tokyo, Japan, in these words: "Greetings and Love."

Rev. Ford C. Ottman, well-known preacher, evangelist, teacher, author, and war worker, next spoke. His subject was "This Same Jesus," and his message was well timed, well thought-out, and well delivered.

Not for one moment did Mr. Alexander relax his grip on the vast crowds in the matter of singing. The preliminary song services grew quickly in interest as new songs were learned under his expert guidance. By the evening of the second day, several hymns quite new to New York congregations had been mastered. Among them was an old time, common meter, which I remember hearing sung lustily by miners in the north of England, when I was a boy, and which Mr. Alexander told us he first heard sung by five hundred Cornish miners in Australia some years ago. It seemed wonderfully strange to me to hear it again, sung to Charles Wesley's words "O for a thousand tongues to sing," in the aristocratic Collegiate Church in Fifth Avenue, New York

In the song service on the second evening meeting of the Conference, the song, "He Turned My Life Around," caught on quickly, and Dr. Chapman's hymn, "One Day," had thoroughly established itself as a favorite. No wonder. The words of the chorus embody a story, it seems, of the whole redemptive work of Christ

Living, he loved me; dying, he saved me;
Buried, he carried my sins far away;
Rising, he justified freely forever;
One day he's coming—O glorious day!

Feeling was very high when Mr. Hugh R. Munro, acting as substitute for Vice-President Marshall, took charge of the meeting. The Vice-President sent a beautiful message regretting his inability to attend. It read in part, "Out of the Babel of tongues now in the world proclaiming, Lo, here is salvation, or, Lo, there is salvation, all history proves that the only sure salvation for the individual or the nation, is the knowledge of and the obedience to the revealed Word of God."

Three moving prayers by Dr. C. I. Scofield, Dr. Biederwolf, and Dr. Curtis Lee Laws, deepened the spiritual tone of the meeting, and when Dr. James M. Gray was called upon to make his address on "The Present Age: its Characteristic and its End," he had a breathlessly eager audience to speak to. Dr. Gray is one of the best known of American Bible teachers, and Christian Herald readers are already familiar with his views on the great subjects of prophecy. His address on this occasion was a comprehensive review of the historic sequences that ultimately resulted in those characteristic of this age which he wished to stress, viz., that it is the age of the Church, not of the Kingdom. The day is coming when the Church will be completed. Then the Lord will come. What a superb motive for Evangelization!

Probably there is no other man in America besides Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman who could have brought this great meeting to such a sublime climax as he did.

"What will it mean to be saved when Christ comes?" was his subject. Seldom, I should think, even in his own evangelistic meetings, has a deeper impression been made or a richer spiritual harvest reaped than on the Tuesday evening meeting of the Conference. It was an absorbing autobiographical account of his transformation from a conventional postmillennial Presbyterian pastor to a whole-souled premillennial Evangelist that he gave to his audience. He did not hesitate to give the names of the human instrumentalities employed—the lady member of his Albany Church, the Rev. Wm. Walton Clark, now a Presbyterian minister in Brooklyn, the quaint Scotch Bible Student in Albany, John Currie, his great friend and associate, Dr. L. Moody, and Dr. Scofield's Bible. The great audience was deeply impressed by the closing appeal and hundreds of hands were raised for prayer.

AT THE morning meeting of the third day, addresses were given by Dr. Ford C. Ottman, on "The Church in the Book of Revelation," and by Dean William L. Pettingill of the Philadelphia School of the Bible, on "The Church and the Kingdom." Dean Pettingill was also the first speaker at the afternoon meeting, which was presided over by Mr. Charles G. Trumbull of the Sunday School Times of Philadelphia.

In the making of the program, the selection of subjects had been carefully considered, and the speakers had stuck fairly well to their texts; but those who were present at all the meetings had become aware by this time of a considerable amount of overlapping which did not seem to diminish the interest of the audiences.

Why the President Goes Abroad

In His Annual Message He Makes His Object Clear

THE opening of the short session of the Sixty-fifth Congress will have a special place in the history both of the nation and of the world. For the first time in the century and a half of the life of the American nation, the representatives of the people assembled to hear the annual message of a Chief Executive about to go abroad at the call of Old World leaders, who desired his help and counsel in the righteous settlement of the tangled problem of reorganization, left by the collapse of the recent alliance of enemies. Old traditions were fast fading as this Congress assembled and a new tradition was in the making. America's day of isolation is over. Strong with the strength of the pure in heart and purpose, the Union born in 1776, and consecrated in the sixties, is called into the arena of the world's life to point the way to those whose training in democracy is but begun. America is a world power, her position is recognized by the whole assembly of associated states, and they call her President, recognized as the greatest world leader and molder of thought and action, to a part in the councils which shall set the boundaries of the future. December 2, 1918, marked the end of America's aloofness; the beginning of her world service.

As the President stepped before the members of the two Houses, gathered in the chamber of the House of Representatives, he was cheered heartily by the members of his party in the House and the people packed in the galleries. Republican Representatives and most of the Senators of both parties remained silently in their seats while the President delivered the address which marked and justified his trip abroad, his breaking of precedents and his setting of the beginnings of new traditions.

The President spoke in part as follows:

"THE year that has elapsed since I last stood before you to fulfil my constitutional duty . . . has been so crowded with great events, great processes and great results, that I cannot hope to give you an adequate picture of its transactions or of the far-reaching changes which have been wrought in the life of our nation and of the world. You have yourselves witnessed these things. . . . But some great outstanding facts are unmistakable. . . .

"A year ago we had sent 145,198 men overseas. Since then we have sent 1,950,513, an average of 162,542 each month. . . . No such movement of troops ever took place before across 3,000 miles of sea, followed by adequate equipment. . . . In all this movement only 758 men were lost by enemy attacks. . . .

"I need not tell you what lay back of this great movement of men and material. It is not invidious to say that back of it lay a supporting organization of the industries of the country and of all its productive activities. . . .

"But it is not the physical scale and executive efficiency of preparation, supply, equipment and dispatch that I would dwell upon, but the mettle and quality of the officers and the men we sent over and of the sailors who kept the seas, and the spirit of the nation that stood behind them. No soldiers or sailors ever proved themselves more quickly ready for the test of battle or acquitted themselves with more splendid courage and achievement when put to the test. . . . from their chiefs, Pershing and Sims, down to the youngest lieutenant. . . . I am proud to be the fellow-countryman of men of such stuff and valor. Those of us who stayed at home did our duty; the war could not have been won or the gallant men who fought it given their opportunity to win it otherwise, but for many a long day we shall think ourselves 'accurs'd we were not there. . . .

"What we all thank God for with deepest gratitude is that our men went in force into the line of battle just at the critical moment when the whole fate of the world seemed to hang in the balance, and threw their fresh strength into the ranks of freedom in time to turn the whole tide and sweep of the fateful struggle—turn it once for all, so that thenceforth it was back, back for their enemies, always back, never again forward. After that it was only a scant four months before the commanders of the Central Empires knew themselves beaten, and now their very empires are in liquidation.

"And throughout it all, how fine the spirit of the nation was, what unity of

"And now we are sure of the great triumph for which every sacrifice was made. It has come—come in its completeness, and with the pride and inspiration of these days of achievement quick within us, we turn to the tasks of peace again—a peace secure against the violence of irresponsible monarchs and ambitious military coteries, and made ready for a new order, for new foundations of justice and fair dealing."

The President then brought up the matter of the unratified Treaty with the Republic of Colombia and asked, that render, but he said that the ordinary processes of private initiative would not provide immediate employment for all the men of our returning armies and he recommended the prompt development of public works of every sort, directing the attention of Congress to the plans already worked out by the Secretary of the Interior for the reclamation of some 300,000,000 acres of arid swamp and cut over lands.

He spoke also of the industrial needs of Belgium and Northern France and declared that the people of these devastated areas must be assisted in their efforts to restore their industries that "they should not be left to the vicissitudes of the sharp competition for materials and for industrial facilities which is now to set in."

He declared it necessary "for the steadying and facilitation of our own domestic business" that we should determine now the taxes to be levied for 1918, 1919 and 1920, and expressed complete agreement with the Secretary of the Treasury in his recommendation regarding bonds and revenue.

He also stated that he took it for granted that Congress would carry on the naval program undertaken before we entered the war.

THE President expressed great concern over the problem of the proper status of the railways. He said he had no confident judgment of his own on the subject, but had reached the conclusion that it would "be a disservice alike to the country and to the owners of the railways to return to the old conditions unmodified. He implied that he was inclined to favor private ownership under unified Federal regulation. He recognized also the need for development of all means of transportation, railways, waterways, highways and countryside roads.

COMING to the subject of his trip abroad the President said:

"I welcome this occasion to announce to the Congress my purpose to join in Paris the representatives of the governments with which we have been associated in the war against the Central Empire for the purpose of discussing with them the main features of the treaty of peace. I realize the great inconvenience that will attend my leaving the country, particularly at this time, but the conclusion that it was my paramount duty to go has been forced upon me by considerations which I hope will seem as conclusive to you as they have seemed to me.

"The allied governments have accepted the bases of peace which I outlined to the Congress on the 8th of January last, as the Central Empire also have, and very reasonably desire my personal counsel in their interpretation and application, and it is highly desirable that I should give it in order that the sincere desire of our government to contribute without selfish purpose of any kind to settlements that will be of common benefit to all the nations concerned may be made fully manifest. The peace settlements which are now to be agreed upon are of transcendent importance, both to us and to the rest of the world, and know of no business or interest which should take precedence of them. The gallant men of our armed forces on land and sea have conspicuously fought for the ideals which they knew to be the ideals of their country. I have sought to express those ideals; they have accepted my statements of them as the substance of their own thought and purpose, as the associated governments have accepted them; I owe it to them to see to it, so far as in me lies, that no false or mistaken interpretation is put upon them, and no possible effort omitted to realize them. It is now my duty to play my full part in making good what they offered their life's blood to obtain. I can think of no call to service which would transcend this." purpose, what untiring zeal, what elevation of purpose ran through all its splendid display of strength, its untiring accomplishment. . . ." (Here the President paid tribute to the men who at great sacrifice had served the nation at the capital and to all in shop and mine and field who had helped to make possible the nation's vast achievement.)

"And what shall we say of the women—of their instant intelligence, quickening every task that they touched; their capacity for organization and cooperation, which gave their action discipline and enhanced the effectiveness of everything they attempted? . . . TAKING up the problems of the return to peace he declared these much more serious for us than for our Allies because they "have suffered the disarrangements and the losses of war longer than we," and "Our people do not wait to be coached and led." He declared that the government had released the raw materials held by the government, and that industry was already set free, but that it had not been possible to remove so readily the control of foodstuffs and of shipping.

Speaking of the return of the soldiers to peace employment he outlined the services which the War Industries Board, the War Trade Board, the Labor Department and the Food and Fuel Administrations were prepared to

For Unity in Christ

DO you know Hall Caine's denomination? We may, but it doesn't matter. Not next week, but in the Christmas issue to follow, Sir Hall Caine outlines his ideals of Church Unity and the coming spiritual league. Next week Prof. Banks tells the story of Aleppo, the beautiful, the ancient Roman city, soon to be the capital of the independent Kingdom of Arabia. Next week also, more letters from leaders of the Church, each one a window looking out upon the field of the church after the war.

In Bethlehem each Christmas-tide sees pilgrims gathered at the shrine above the spot where Christ was born. Next week, a story of the Christmas festival in Bethlehem. "If Every Day Were Christmas," there would be joy to spare. Dr. Edgar DeWitt Jones, with this as his title, preaches next week a sermon of comfort and confident hope. This week Dr. Francis E. Clark, loved of three generations of disciples in Christian Endeavor, begins the fortnightly telling of the wonderfully interesting Story of his Life.

A Boy's Best Friend

By

REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

DR. CLARK, the founder and president of Christian Endeavor, is a remarkable personality in the story of this nation's spiritual progress in the last quarter century or even longer. He has written for the readers of the Christian Herald a series of reminiscences, the first of which appears below. It is a great privilege to have from this successful Christian worker the story of his world-wide experiences, written in the calm twilight of a remarkable life.

I HAVE been asked by the editor of the Christian Herald to write some reminiscences of a somewhat varied life. These reminiscences naturally begin with my own earliest recollections, since I do not propose to burden the reader with ancestral lore. What can come before memories of his mother in a boy's consciousness? A million men will doubtless each declare that he had the best mother in the world.

My mother died when I was but seven years old—at least her body was then laid in the grave, almost sixty years ago; but she did not die to me. Indeed, there are few people so really alive to me as is she. I know many thousands of people more or less intimately, but among them all there are not half a dozen of whom I think so often as of her, or who so really influence my life today.

I wonder if there is not a thought of comfort here for toiling, anxious young mothers who sometimes feel that all their care and love are wasted, and that if they were taken away from their children in early life they would be remembered no more.

Dr. Clark's mother, who died when he was seven and one-half years old

My parents, though of old Massachusetts stock for eight generations back, and of Bay State birth and rearing, were living in a little frontier Canadian town named Aylmer, when I was born. Thither my father's business of surveyor and timber-locator had carried him, and thither he took his bride from her Massachusetts home, to make another home for him and their children on the edge of the vast Canadian wilderness then almost unbroken from the great Ottawa River to the North Pole.

I am glad that I first saw the light when and where I did. The "when" was the beginning of the last half of the nineteenth century—a half century of wonderful world progress and marvelous invention. The half-century of electricity, of the Victorian literary era—often scoffed at, to be sure, by moderns, but the era of great poets and novelists—and the regenerating era of our own Civil War. The "where" gave me a remembrance at least of the brave struggle of American pioneers, in which my own parents had a part. Theirs were among the "pilgrim feet."

Whose stern, impassioned stress,
A thoroughfare for freedom beat
Across the wilderness.

Among my earliest recollections are memories of the great rafts of huge logs, sometimes acres in extent, that came floating down the Ottawa, which at Aylmer is three miles wide, the rafts bound for the sawmills at Hull or farther down the river.

The city of Ottawa, the beautiful capital of the Dominion of Canada, was then a mere village called Bytown, while Aylmer, seven miles distant, was the metropolis of the region. Long weeks and months my father spent on the upper waters of the Ottawa River, his only companions Indian guides or French Canadian trappers, with all of whom he was exceedingly popular. Whenever his duties would permit, he came home to spend a little time with his wife and children, and then he must be off again for the "bush." There were many of these brief but exceedingly happy meetings.

Alas, there was one journey from which the loved husband did not return; for one day, in the summer of 1853, he kissed his wife and children and left his home for the last time. It was the fatal cholera year. Old inhabitants still recall it with a shudder. The dread disease, imported from Europe with the emigrants, secured a sudden and dreadful grip upon the New World. It raged with awful fury. Whole towns were decimated. Shiploads of passengers in crossing the Atlantic never saw the new land for which they were bound. In three hours, often, the disease ran its course.

ONE of those whom this dread disaster claimed, while he was ministering to others, was my father, who a few weeks before had left his "Cherry Cottage" home in Aylmer in high health and spirits. The dreadful news was broken to the widow, and she hurried to Three Rivers, a town midway between Montreal and Quebec, where her husband had died, but it was too late even to see his dead face.

"Husband of my youth," she sobs to her journal in after years, "beloved of my heart, could I but have seen you, could I but have imprinted one kiss on that dear brow, could I have felt the pressure of those dear hands and heard the last loving farewell! But it was the will of my heavenly Father, and he doeth all things well."

This sad blow, which left her on the edge of the wilderness, far from most of her kith and kin, with very slender resources and with two children to support (two others had died in infancy), really brought out all that was strongest and noblest in my mother's character. She resolved to support herself and children by opening a private school. She had been a favorite pupil of Mary Lyon (America's greatest woman), and she had taught school before her marriage in the Western Reserve of Ohio. These experiences stood her in good stead in this new venture, and for five years in this frontier village, where the demands for the culture of the schools was not excessive, she maintained her family, and became a real power for good in all the community.

She was gifted beyond most women, with a genuine poetic soul, a rare gift of expression, as is proved by her journal and her letters, which, after nearly fifty years, I had printed for private circulation. She was winsome and attractive in her person, but her religion was the mainspring of her character, and on that I love to dwell. It was exhibited in her gratitude and thanksgiving for little mercies, and it rebukes my own ungrateful life.

MANY a woman would have thought she had very little cause for gratitude. A widow, thrown in early life upon her own resources; a family to support by the hard grinding life of a schoolmistress, far from childhood's home and friends—what had she to be peculiarly grateful for?

Yet almost every entry in the journal is a psalm of thanksgiving. In the smallest occurrence she found evidence of God's peculiar goodness. The ability to lay in a winter's supply of wood, the payment of a just debt by one of her pupils, the kindness of a blacksmith who mended a utensil for her, the faithfulness of a kitchen-maid, a kind note, a pleasant call—all fill her heart with gladness and her lips with praise, and cause her to cry out over and over again: "Bless the Lord, O my soul."

Let me transcribe a few lines: "Feb. 7, 1856. I see much, very much to be thankful for. Almost every one has paid their bills. I have been able to pay all I owe, and have a little left."

"Feb. 18. Today I am better, and this evening feel quite well. How much I have to be thankful for in my continued health!"

"Oct. 21. I have taken a new bedroom over the kitchen, which is very warm and comfortable. Truly the Lord is good, and will not suffer the soul of those that trust in him to want."

"Nov. 13. How much I have to be thankful for! Let me enumerate some of my blessings. I have a good comfortable home and an abundance of good dry wood; I have on hand provisions sufficient, or nearly so, for three months. My own health and that of my children is very good. 'Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me, bless his holy name.'

Could anything show more plainly the "merry heart" that doeth good like a medicine?

Five years after her husband's death came another stunning blow in the death of her eldest son, Charles, a boy of nearly seventeen, ten years my senior. He was an unusually fine fellow, a splendid scholar, a writer of promise, an earnest Christian, a strong, manly boy, on whom his mother had begun to lean as though he were a grown man.

NOW she was indeed alone, with only a little seven-year-old son left, her health failing, the future none of the brightest, yet she could write like this, in an entry in her journal meant for no eyes but her own:

"Nov. 10, 1858. Eighteen years ago today I was married. How much has transpired in that period! How much joy and how much sorrow! The years I spent with my beloved husband were years of great happiness. Few have had a happier married life than mine, but the dear partner of my youth, the father of my children, the kind and tender husband, the noble, generous friend, has been gone more than four years, and now my first-born, my beloved Charlie, lies in his low grave. But I shall meet them all again in the Better Land—my beloved husband, my sweet Edward, my little Kate, my noble Charlie. Oh, what a dear family I have in that Better Land; what a joy to meet them all again! Oh my Father, I thank thee for the blessed prospect before me! I thank thee for all the joy of the past eighteen years; and, oh, grant that all the sorrow may work out for me 'a far more eternal and exceeding weight of joy!' I thank thee for the dear little one left. Oh, may he grow up like his dear brother, a true Christian!"

I have let my mother speak for herself. My own words seem poor and tame compared with hers.

Boys and girls, who read these words, thank God for a Christian mother. You may have many friends, but none like her. Is she alive? Treasure her, love her, comfort her if she needs comfort; you will never have another like her.

Mothers all, yours is the greatest privilege on earth, for you can train boys and girls who will never forget you. You need not envy any queen or empress. You will all soon have the ballot, as you ought, but you already have something far more precious, the privilege of making good men and women. Whether you live many years or few, I can ask nothing better for you than that your children love and revere your memory as I love and revere the memory of my own dear mother.

The President's Fourteen Points

IT is interesting and heartening news that the Associated Press brings from Paris of the acceptance by the Allied statesmen of President Wilson's fourteen points, with one reservation and an addition, as a basis of the negotiations of the forthcoming Peace Conference. These fourteen points, which have already accomplished a decisive result, now promise to be woven, with slight modification, into the fabric of the world of the future.

These are the principles upon which America was fired to its unselfish part in the conflict. They are the principles upon which the Allies joined in unified command and with revived hope and vigor. They are the principles through which the democratic elements in Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria and finally Germany itself gained power and ascendancy, and through which autocracy dissolved and surrendered.

These fourteen points were unquestionably the great inspirational, unifying, convincing and determining factor of the war. Having served as the solvent of the world strife, they now stand as a safe basis of just and enduring peace.

American history, traditions and ideals had furnished to the world a model of freedom. American militant manhood has struck the decisive blow that stripped the shackles from the oppressed peoples. And now American statesmanship, through these fourteen points, with their provisions for open diplomacy, free seas and a league of nations, offers guarantee of the permanence of peace built on justice.

Unseen Forces

THAT the utmost resources devised by man are weak and insignificant, in comparison with the forces of nature, is so well understood that it hardly needs discussion. Storm has stopped many a battle and changed the tide of victory when least expected. Winter, with its deep snows and icy gales, was the real conqueror in Napoleon's disastrous Russian campaign. It was the storms and high tides that swept the Spanish Armada off the seas and saved England. And now it has remained for that eminent historian and theologian, Dr. Alexander Robertson, for many years resident in Venice, to point out how the hidden forces of nature were let loose to wreck the Austrian host and save the historic city from impending disaster. In his notable contribution to the religious literature of the war, which is given elsewhere in this issue, he establishes a parallel between the disaster which overwhelmed the Austrians on the Piave and the fate of the hosts of Pharaoh who perished in the Red Sea. His illustration is one that will interest Bible readers everywhere.

History abounds in interventions in behalf of the weak as against the strong. The Christian Herald has already called attention to the complete transformation that took place in the morale of the Allies in France immediately after the day which had been devoted to national prayer for forgiveness and victory. That day marked the turning of the tide and witnessed the beginning of a series of Allied successes on all the fronts, which went on in impressive succession until the final victory culminated in the German surrender. In that change we recognize the operation of invisible forces which cannot be analyzed by any process of the human mind. Before peace is finally concluded we may have still other illustrations of this power, but only in proportion as we trust in the justice and goodness of God, and remain true to the high and pure ideals we have set up as our aim in the war. To lower these ideals would result in ultimate disappointment. They must be kept constantly before the Peace Conference, and no desires on the part of the representatives of any nation, for aggrandizement or material or political advantage, should be permitted to lower them. Only as the conference exercises its powers on the noblest and most exalted plane, with the single purpose of helping Europe and the world to a just and righteous peace, can it hope to be successful in the largest sense.

The eyes of the nations are fixed on the conference, and the prayers of all peoples should ascend, that it may be guided by pure and unselfish motives throughout, and that in all its deliberations it may seek the aid of divine wisdom. There never was so grand an opportunity to do real world service as that now presented. As Lloyd George has pointed out, the nations represented in the conference will have it in their power "to found a new Europe"; and to avert future wars, promote international brotherhood and thus make the whole world its debtor. The conference can only succeed in doing this in proportion as it relies firmly upon divine guidance at every step of the way.

Don't Forget China's Orphans

AS the Christmas season draws near, we would remind our readers of the orphans of China. There are still some 700 of these little folks who are wholly dependent upon the support they receive from the kind-hearted friends of the Christian Herald. They are distributed among nearly a score of missions, where they are being trained and taught with a view to becoming self-supporting Christian men and women. Originally the number under support was about 2,000. The majority of these have grown up and are now leading noble and useful lives. It has been a pleasure for those readers of this journal who have had a share in this child-saving work, and it has brought a blessing to many.

We need hardly explain that during the last four years China, in common with all other lands, has suffered the privations of war. Many an orphanage group has had to go hungry at times; yet God's goodness has never failed them utterly. We appeal to our readers now, at this time when all the world is rejoiced over the coming of peace, to send a gift for the China orphans. Let us show our gratitude by providing, as far as possible, for their needs in the immediate future. The Christian Herald invites the members of its Family Circle to help in making up such a gift for China as will cheer the missionaries and assure the welfare of our little protégés for a time at least. Contributions should be addressed to the China Orphan Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

World Evangelization

AT a recent meeting in Nashville, Tenn., of the Executive Committee of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, after a season of earnest prayer, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Meeting, as the world war has done, with victory to the forces fighting for freedom, and feeling that if peace is to be permanent and the war is to be followed by an era of good-will that shall hasten the realization of human brotherhood, it must be through the world-wide dissemination and practice of the teachings of Jesus, we recommend that this Executive Committee of Foreign Missions, through our Chairman, Rev. James I. Vance, invite the Foreign Mission Boards of North America, the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A., to plan for a simultaneous missionary drive to be conducted by all the Protestant evangelical churches of North America, to raise a sufficient fund for the equipment and support of all their foreign mission work, and to recruit a sufficient force of evangelists, teachers, doctors, and nurses to go to the front, that the non-Christian world may be immediately evangelized, and Christian education, medical and sanitary work, and social service may be adequately done in non-Christian lands. In order that this may be initiated at once, we ask for the appointment of delegates to meet in New York, December 17, to confer and report to the annual conference of Foreign Mission Boards in January.

It is explained that the conviction leading to this action is that the world situation now confronting the entire Church as the war closes "calls for a bigger program and correspondingly increased resources. The experience of the war justifies Protestant Christianity in launching a united drive for world evangelization. The fact that the Christian message is the only hope of creating permanent peace conditions should invest such a movement with a powerful appeal at this time."

The Christian Herald is in hearty accord with such a unified program. To evangelize the world is, in effect, the carrying out of the Great Commission. Not the conversion of the world, for that is only to be accomplished by the power of the Holy Spirit; but the presentation in all lands of the Gospel message—that is the Church's work and it is as yet unfinished. There are still parts of Central Asia, China, Arabia, Africa and, we believe, some portions of South America, where no Gospel message has yet been delivered. Summoning all its resources and working in energetic cooperation, the Christian Church should be able to complete this work, it has been estimated, in a single year!

This is a task to carry out which the means and the men should not be wanting.

Human Wastage

THAT thousands of children in rural and small-town communities are being deprived of a fair chance for normal development is the assertion of the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor.

One hundred and eighty-five New York State children who were implicated in some sort of wrongdoing, and who came from 144 different families, were carefully studied. Most of the children were of normal mentality, but lack of opportunity for moral and mental training, for recreation and lack of variety of interesting occupations with promising futures, led these children of normal mental power into delinquency.

These New York cases show a type of social life that, as the report points out, can "unfortunately be matched in many places." Vivid, detailed descriptions show how the families and communities of these 185 little children failed to safeguard them from early temptations to wrongdoing which will doubtless lead, in many instances, to wasted, stunted lives. Although in nearly half the cases the child lived in its own home with its father and mother there was a lack of control on the part of the parents and a disregard on their part for the rights of others.

What were these communities doing to save themselves from the moral and financial burden of caring for the misdemeanants their lack of foresight had produced? Prisons for criminals are admittedly an expensive way to safeguard the moral fabric.

The report shows how "pitifully inadequate" the tiny educational unit in the back country, with its isolation and slight equipment, usually is to meet modern demands. The Church, the report states, "holds a real and valuable place in the socializing of the country," but was found to be making "most unequal use" of its opportunity.

The impracticability of securing skilled probation officers and juvenile court judges for each small community leads to the recommendation of a county juvenile court and the extension of the powers of such courts where they now exist, in order that the court may reach the remotest corners of each county.

THE need for food conservation and elimination of all waste by the American people was never so great as at the present time.

Unfortunately, the common belief throughout the country seems to be that the 1918 crop was a phenomenally large one, and that in consequence there exists in this country a great plentitude of food and the time for saving has passed.

The prevalent belief that with the coming of peace the old order of plenty will be restored is a dangerous one. Recent market events have shown that this error is very widespread, and it is doubly unfortunate when accepted by the producing section of the country, whose burdens will really become heavier than ever.

Last year the Food Administration's requests were very largely for the substitution of one food for another. This year actual saving is required on all foods. Before the war, with normal reserves and normal conditions prevailing and with plenty of agricultural labor, our exports to the Allied countries averaged 5,533,000 tons of food per year. Last year we were able to export to them 11,820,000 tons, and this year, even while the war was on, we had assumed the burden of sending them a minimum of 17,550,000 tons. With the coming of peace this minimum was raised to 20,000,000 tons.

Peace does not add one pound of food to our supply. On the contrary, it enormously increases our food obligations because it allows us to reach with food the people of Poland, Rumania, Serbia, Armenia, European Russia, Germany and others who are now without adequate food supply. The total number of these peoples has been estimated at 300,000,000, some of whom have partial food resources and some of whom are now literally in a starving condition.

A most casual survey of the situation immediately convinces one that the necessity for America's supervision of food exports will be greater in peace than at any time during the war.

Stricter conservation than ever is required in the interest of starving humanity.

Seed-Sowing in the Trenches

By EDITH FOX NORTON

DO YOU see this bit of ground that you are traveling over?" said our officer guide to us, as we traversed the first line trenches between Ramscapelle and Nienport on the Belgian front. "Here," he said, "sixty thousand Belgian and French soldiers laid down their lives."

What a privilege it was to pass over that consecrated ground, to be handing to the men who still remained keeping their vigils along the little Yser river the life-giving Word of God! Surely that forms the brightest picture of all this terrible war. How many a Belgian soldier had written to us to thank us for the copy of the New Testament which he had received! He had read it and he had found the Christ of whom those pages speak. And in writing to us he said, "I thank God for this war, for the years of separation from home and family, for out for my terrible sufferings I might never have found Christ my Lord."

We had never before realized the power of the Word of God to save human lives as we have since we were given our ministry to the soldiers of the Belgian army. One example: A soldier, Jacques R., was sitting in a trench which bore the name "Le boyau de la mort." This name signified "the bowels of death," and it was a death trap, or just a little distance away the German trench across the narrow river, and it was on higher ground than their own trench. A heavy bombardment was on. They were expecting death any moment, and he found a little book lying close to him. He took it and began reading it, and found it to be the Gospel of St. John. It recalled to him a period in his life when he attended Protestant service in Brussels. He read and read, and at last the Word, sent home by the Holy Spirit, had done its work, and Jacques had accepted the Saviour. He wrote his name on the back cover at the end of the Decision form, tore it off and at the end of the bombardment sent it on to us in London. This was his way of confessing openly before men Christ his Saviour. Afterward we met him, and were surprised at the great change in his countenance.

SOME one else was surprised also at that change. For Jacques paid a visit to his cousin at another part of the line. A little later we got a letter from his cousin, and this is what he said: "For years I have been a skeptic, believing in nothing. But one day my cousin Jacques came for a visit. I saw so great a change in him that I marveled. I was reckless, unhappy, miserable. My cousin was peaceful, joyous and full of cheer. I said to Jacques, 'You're different. What has made this difference?' And he replied, 'It is the Word of God that I found in the trench that day of the bombardment, when I was expecting death every moment, and it has transformed my life. And so he gave me your address, dear friends, and I write to you to know if you will not give me also that which has so greatly changed my cousin's life."

An officer says: "A New Testament and some other books of the Protestant religion have been sent to a soldier, Joachim Amour, pertaining to my company. This soldier is in my service as orderly. On my request he has given me some books of your religion. Although of the age of twenty-one years, I have never yet fixed help in this book, and you will see that you will get all right again."

"This I did that same evening before going to bed. The next day I wrote to the Protestant pastor for more explanation, and now it is six weeks since all this happened. I am now very strong and I fear nothing. T. GOSSELIN, Corporal."

BUT our ministrations have not been confined to the soldiers in the trenches. Others are just as needy. And so it came to pass that one day at the home of a friend in England I met the cousin of my hostess, a tall young officer of the First Life Guards, one of Great Britain's crack regiments.

"I wish you would speak to Jack," my hostess said. "He is going back to the front this week, and I do not believe he is a Christian."

It was with real trepidation of spirit that I addressed him that evening in the drawing-room. He received my words kindly, but there seemed to be not much conviction. However, he begged me to write to him, and so in the winter that followed we were constantly in correspondence with this young officer from South Africa. When spring came, he came back to London on leave. He came to our little flat to have dinner with my husband and myself. After dinner was over, he turned to my husband and said, "I want you both to know that I have accepted Christ as my Saviour. Would you like to know how it happened?"

"Yes, indeed," we both said eagerly. And then he told us the story. "It was the night before Christmas on the Somme. Just before midnight we left for the lines, I taking my platoon. The whole battalion were marching for the trenches, a thousand strong. It was the night before Christmas and the men's hearts were as heavy as their boots as they tramped along. Suddenly a star-shell was thrown up from the battlefield. Ahead of us was the wall of a ruined church. Nothing remained but the Christ on the cross. The men saw it, their hearts were turned toward Him whose representation it was, and with one accord they sang,

"Oh come, all ye faithful, joyfully triumphant,
Gather to Bethlehem with glad accord.
Low in a manger lies the King of angels.
Oh come, let us adore him, Christ the Lord."

"It was just then," went on Jack, "I admitted him into my heart. Up the line we went," he said, "a thousand strong. Seventy-seven came back alive."

So it is the same blessed Gospel message that appeals to high and low alike, and many are the trophies this war will have won for Jesus Christ and for his kingdom.

Belgian soldiers grouped before the Protestant hut. In the center stands the Protestant chaplain and his wife my choice on a religion. I desire above all to be acquainted with the religion which is the one to which I want to submit my life. If it is not inconvenient to you, I would be glad to keep and read these books that you offer so graciously to our soldiers. With my warm thanks I pray you to accept the expression of my respectful sentiments. CH. L., Adjutant."

One of our Belgian boys wrote from the trenches as follows:

"For a long time I suffered without knowing why. I was never contented and felt happy nowhere. Everywhere I was afraid. I walked like a machine which is started in the morning to stop at night when its work is done, only to commence again the next day. I did not know what to do or where to go, and wherever I was everything seemed wrong.

"One day I was going over the works when I was stopped by a soldier, who said to me, 'Well, corporal, you don't seem to hear me. I have spoken to you three times.' And when he continued, 'You seem always in bad humor,' I did not know what to reply, but I said, 'My friend, I am very unhappy. I am ill. I do not know what has come over me lately.' He then asked me to go for a little walk with him in the evening when we could talk undisturbed. We met and as we walked he gave me a little book, saying, 'Read a little of that every evening, and you will find

THERE is no reason why any family that can spend a dollar on a tree

should not have one. We will assume that the tree itself costs fifteen cents, and a small tree can make up as much fun as the biggest ever cut. This leaves eighty-five cents for decorations.

Buy first a ten-cent roll of crepe paper and one of the ten-cent rolls of different colored papers; if you like you may spend a dime for red and white paper only, but the children are apt to like the tree better if it has all the possible colors on it. Mucilage will cost another nickel, and if you can, get a five-cent spool of fine wire such as is used in making paper flowers. Very effective garlands can be made with this. Wind the wire round a knitting-needle so as to make a curly wire "stem" in a loose but even spiral, slipping it off as the needle is filled; cut a narrow strip of crepe paper crosswise of the crepe, and roll it between finger and thumb, winding it about the wire, just as a spinner does the wool. This makes a firm, white-covered stem. Cut petals like rose-petals, about an inch square, bunch four or five together at the base, wind a short piece of white-covered wire around them for the stem, and that makes a flower. They should not be too large. Shape the petals with the fingers so that the flower will be cup-shaped and put it on a longer stem, then another and another, about three inches apart, making a garland. This takes much less time than popping corn and makes more show.

Meanwhile the smaller children can make cornucopias. For these, take a square of paper about as thick as writing-paper, roll it into the shape of a horn by lapping one side over the adjacent one, and fasten with paste, or bits of colored ribbon or string tied in two or three places according to the size of the horn. Put a handle of paper, ribbon or string across the top, and after filling the horn tuck in the pointed end. This is the way the old Christmas horns of sugar-plums were made.

For filling the horns, very nice candy (which is also wholesome) can be made from puffed grains, just as cornballs are made, with molasses or sugar syrup; and it is so light that it is just the thing for a Christmas tree. Pour the candy into a pan, cut it into lumps about the size of a walnut when cold, and use half the syrup for making peanut candy—the nuts will cost another five cents. If there are whole raisins in the house for the Christmas pudding, and also cloves, you can make clove turtles by sticking a clove at the end opposite the stem end, for the turtle's head, then make the four legs by pinching out the middle of four cloves and leave the stem for the tail.

Old tin cans in small sizes will make effective Christmas lanterns and will be safer than unprotected candles. Allow ten cents for candles. Holes can be punched in a tin can after covering it with bright paper. Another effective lantern may be made of the square cigar-boxes which the dealers are usually glad to give away.

Another nickel will buy a lot of the silver tinsel made for Christmas trees. Save out the best of the peanuts; very cunning little fairy dolls may be made by sticking a toothpick through one end for arms, painting a face on the other end, and dressing the doll in a frilly skirt and cape of crepe paper, with a sash of a bit of ribbon. The Church in the New Age

A SERMON BY REV. W. A. HUTCHINSON *

TEXT—I Corinthians, Third Chapter, Verses 10 to 15.

A NUMBER of years ago I sat in the assay office of a mining company in Colorado, when a miner or prospector came in with a lump of rock about as large as a man's head, and said to the man in charge of the office: "I want you to make a test of this ore." The assayer took the rock, broke it up with a large hammer, gathered the pieces all up and put them on a large steel table, and pounded them into fine dust. He then gathered it all up carefully, put it on another steel-faced table, and with a heavy roller rolled it until it was pulverized. Then he gathered it all up carefully again, put it into a crucible and put the crucible into the furnace and closed the door.

We sat and talked for nearly an hour, when he got up and opened the furnace and looked in, closed the door again, and we talked for nearly another hour. When he again opened the furnace, he took the tongs, reached in and took out the crucible and set it on an iron table. It was red hot when he took it from the furnace. He next took a hand-bellows and blew the dust and ashes out of the crucible. After the crucible had cooled he said to me: "Come over and see how much gold there was in that rock." I went over and looked into the crucible, but could detect nothing. I said, "Is it all gone?" "No," he answered, and taking a small pair of tweezers he reached down into the bottom of the crucible and picked out a small piece of gold about half the size of a pinhead. "That is what was in it," he said, "but that is pure gold." That was all that came through the pounding, the rolling, the crushing and the fiery furnace, but it was pure gold!

In the great world conflict across the seas, God Almighty has taken the so-called Christian civilization; German "Kultur" and German ideals of civil government, militarism, autocracy; and also the principles of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, as expressed in the teaching of the hundred and one different Christian denominations, both Catholic and Protestant; and he has thrown them into the crucible of world war. Out of this furnace of fiery trial will come only that which is pure gold. After the furnace has done its work, with the breath of His mouth, through the bellows of His purified church, Jesus Christ is going to blow away all the dust and ashes and dross, the false ideas and teachings of men on both religion and civil government. Only the pure gold of the Gospel, truth, justice and righteousness will be able to stand the test of that consuming fire.

NOT only has Christian civilization and teaching, both Catholic and Protestant, been thrown into the furnace, but all forms of civil government, Monarchical and Republican, Autocracy and Democracy, must now come under the fiery test of this "vial of the wrath of Almighty God which has been poured out upon the nations of earth."

On the part of Germany the world-war has been not only an effort to establish a "world-empire," but just as great an effort to create a world-religion. To quote from Nietzsche, one of the greatest of the German philosophers, whose teaching is so largely responsible for this awful world war, let us hear what he says: "While preparing to found a world-empire, Germany is also preparing to create world-religion. No cultured European nation since the French revolution has made any experiment in creative religion. . . . The present bent of mind in the universities, among the most cultured, is toward the religion of Valor, which speaks thus: 'You have heard how in old times it was said, Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth; but I say unto you, Blessed are the valiant, for they shall make the earth their throne.' Again it hath been said, Blessed are the poor in spirit; but I say unto you, Blessed are the great in soul, for they shall enter into Valhalla. And ye have heard men say, Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God; but I say unto you, Blessed are the warmakers, for they shall be called, if not the children of Jahve (Jehovah), the children of Odin, who is greater than Jehovah."

I don't see how he could have been truer to the "German bent of mind," except he had said: "They shall be the children of the Kaiser, who is greater than Jehovah." If such teaching as this had been limited to Germany, we might have had little occasion for alarm, but this kind of religious teaching is rife in every nation in Christendom, including our own. Our colleges, universities and seminaries are permeated with it, and many of our pulpits have been its mouthpieces. My own seminary—among the most conservative in the land—twenty-five years ago was teaching this German rationalism, and calling it "science." If a young man did not swallow it whole without mastication or investigation, he was called narrow and "a back number." Nearly all the professors in the seminaries spent from two to five years "topping off" on this kind of German rot. And many of the graduates of the seminaries, if they had the means, considered their education incomplete without one or two years of this German "Kultur," and almost without exception after their study abroad they came back as destructive critics of the Word of God and they were welcomed to the larger pulpits, because the influential churches had contracted the "itching ear" disease.

FOR forty years we have been dancing to the music of German "Kultur." For the last four years we have been paying the fiddler. But there is hope! All the "wood, hay and stubble" of the so-called Christian civilization, as well as the pure gold of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, are in the fiery furnace of world war; and only that which is pure gold will be able to endure the test.

Is the Gospel going to stand the test? Is the Christian religion going to come through the fiery furnace victoriously? Is this furnace of testing a purifying process or a destroying scourge? I believe Jesus. Let Jesus answer these questions: "Upon this foundation will I build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." I believe Jesus! "The words I speak unto you are not mine, but the Father's which sent me." I believe the word of God spoken by Jesus! "The grass withereth and the flower falleth, but the Word of our God shall stand forever." "Heaven and earth may pass away, but one jot nor one tittle shall not fail, until all shall be fulfilled." Mon and the devices of man may fail. The wisdom of men and the teaching of men may be burned up. German "Kultur" and German ideals may go down in the seuffle. Thrones and empires may perish. Autocracy or Democracy may come or go. So-called Christian civilization and so-called Christian governments may suffer loss. "Evil men may wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." But Jesus Christ shall yet set up his Kingdom in the earth, put down all other rule and authority, and reign from the rivers unto the ends of the earth.

The Church in the new age will be characterized by less formalism, less ritualism and more spiritual power. Not so much saying of prayers, but more praying in spirit and in truth. Not so much worship through the material, external things, which are the works of men's hands, but more personal worship of God in spirit and in truth. Less of the mechanical, ecclesiastical, superficial, conventional, non-essential sham of worship through a system, and more of personal communion with our Father God.

There is much complaint in these days because of the destruction of what have been called "The masterpieces of art and statuary" in the churches of Europe.

I am not so sure that this is calamity. One thing is sure; there will be less of this kind of thing to worship, or to worship through, now that the war is over. Much of it has been superficial, and some of it was a positive misrepresentation of the real.

THE Church in the new age will be characterized by less of the sentimental, more of the practical. Less talking about our own personal experience, more witnessing to the power of the living Christ. Less talk about our religion and our church, and more doing of the things that are religious and Christian. Less boasting about the numerical and financial strength of our denomination, and more glorying in the "power of the Gospel of Jesus Christ" to save lost men.

The Church in the new age will be characterized by a less autocratic and a more democratic form of policy. The democratizing of the state in China and Russia and the world has also been the democratizing of the Church in the world. The coming Church will have less of the spirit of priestly overlordship, and more of the spirit of Christian ministry and brotherhood. Less cant and caste and more of the Christian spirit of the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man.

The Church in the new age will be characterized by less of the teaching of the wisdom and theories of men, and more of the teaching of the principles of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Less of the teaching of "science, so-called," and more of the teaching of the truth of God, which is the only true science. The coming Church will be an investigating church, with a mind open to all forms of new truth, or old truth, but unwilling to call it "science" until it has been proven to be so.

The future Church will be an instructed church, because it will have a teaching ministry. A ministry who will not be satisfied with a mixture of literary sleeping-powders and German "Kultur." A ministry who will be satisfied with nothing less than the pure gold of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Less destructive criticism, and more faith in the "Impregnable Rock of God's Holy Word."

THE Church in the new age will be characterized by less sectarianism, more co-operation. Less talk about denominationalism, more talk about inter-denominationalism. Less talk about my church, and more talk about the Church of Jesus Christ. Less desire to outstrip the foremost in the race for numbers and material wealth, and more of a desire to help on the hindermost to true manhood and Christian character. The coming Church will be a big brotherhood where the strong will delight to help the weak. A big family with every member cared for. The coming Church will be characterized by the spirit of service which is the Spirit of Christ.

Lord help me live from day to day
In such a self-forgetful way
That even when I kneel to pray
My prayer shall be for—others.

Help me in all the work I do
To ever be sincere and true
And know that all I'd do for you Must needs be done for—others.

Let "Self" be crucified and slain
And buried deep: and all in vain
May efforts be to rise again
Unless to live for—others.

And when my work on earth is done,
And my new work in heaven's begun
May I forget the crown I've won While thinking still of—others.

Others, Lord, yes, others.
Let this my motto be,
Help me to live for others,
That I may live like thee.

Jerusalem's Gratitude to America Eloquently Expressed

DR. JOHN H. FINLEY, of the American Red Cross Commission in Palestine, lately returned from the Holy Land, tells of an impressive meeting with the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, one of the most interesting religious personalities in the world today.

This eminent dignitary, although almost a recluse, had still kept in touch with the world movement. This is what he said to Dr. Finley and his American Red Cross Associates:

"No one can dispute the fact known to God and confirmed by your noble history, O citizens of America, that out of compassion and charity he created you to do good to humanity, and has through you always accomplished good work, keeping you innocent of all evil-doing.

"Joy and gladness to you, and may God be praised who showers good as he desires!

"No one can wonder at this when you are the children of so generous a mother, the great nation—I mean Great Britain, with her glorious past and exalted glory.

"Your good works cannot be counted; and you should extend your arm from beyond the seas to grasp the hand of that mother, full of love and compassion, for one reason only, to further the cause of the oppressed and to turn aside with blows the hand of the oppressor in this bloody and fearful war, the like of which has never been seen before, and, by God's will, may never be seen again.

"To extend a helping hand to the children of Syria and Palestine in your native land, America was not enough, but you have crossed the seas and desert and undergone the hardships of this present time to succor the poor and homeless widows and orphans of all Palestine, and more especially of the Holy City, the city of the prophets of God where we are all now united.

"On behalf of these in general, and of Moslems in particular, I burn incense on the altars of gratitude and pray the great God to make you a good reward defend you from every evil, make your benevolent undertakings successful, and hasten the days of peace which we all await impatiently."

Seeking, Yet Always Finding

SUNDAY, December 15. Ps. 63 : 8. "My soul followeth hard after thee: thy right hand upholdeth me." That is one of the strange conjunctions which are to be found in the Scriptures. They frequently present the aspect of a contradiction. Here is a soul following after the Lord, and yet the hand of the Lord is resting upon him. In one way he is running after; in another way he has arrived. He is on the road, and yet he is at the goal. He is seeking the Lord, and yet he is in communion with him. It is a paradox in speech, but it is a glorious commonplace in Christian experience. We can be in Christ, and yet we can be following after him. We can be at rest in the Lord, and yet a zealous quest of him.

Let us mark the vigorous strength of the psalmist's words: "My soul followeth hard after thee." There is something very intense and strenuous about the figure of speech. Shall we be using the word unlawfully if we interpret it through the imagery of a hound which has found the scent of his prey and is now away on the alluring track in full pursuit?

But the quest of the Lord is not a one-sided affair of this kind. If there is the hound of earth, there is also the wonderful love which is the hound of heaven. It comes forth to seek and to save. It finds us in our low estate. It secretly ministers to us in our quest. "Thy right hand upholdeth me." The heavenly Lover brings secret resource to the runner. He administers the hidden manna to ward off faintness on the road. There is a mystic fellowship in which we eat his flesh and drink his blood. For is not this the wonderful ministry of grace? The divine race upholds us while we are on the way to God. It opens its bountiful wallet and brings us inspiration for the journey. It prepares a table before us in the presence of our enemies. We feast while we run.

The Stayed Mind

MONDAY, December 16. Isa. 26 : 3. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee: because he trusteth in thee." On the tofite that marks the resting-place of a devout Christian, beneath his name and the dates of his birth and death, is the simple word, "Kept." Simple word it is, but how much it means! Kept in perfect peace, kept in the love of God, kept from falling, kept by the power of God through faith into salvation. The Christian religion is a religion of keeping and being kept. We are not satisfied to be kept in the path of righteousness; we need also to be kept in the path of quietude, of inner rest, of calm serenity, of undisturbed outlook upon the future, whether it be the little future of tomorrow or the great future of ages yet to come.

Peace is a sweet word. The world exults in new-found peace after years of tumult and strife. But his peace is not yet perfect, nor can it ever be until human society is governed willingly by reference to the laws of God. The peace God promises is one which can be fully realized only by the mind that is stayed on God, the will that is surrendered to him. It is not the peace of stagnation, but the peace of unwearied activity. Henry Drummond's illustration of perfect peace is the picture of a bird sitting on her nest built in the boughs of a tree overlooking aataract. Sidney Lanier says, "I will build me a nest in the greatness of God." Elizabeth Barrett Browning smiled "to think God's greatness flows around our incompleteness." "Do you know how his is coming out?" a man asked of a friend engaged in an important enterprise. He answered, "No, but the God I work for knows how it is coming out, and I am not afraid." His mind was stayed and his spirit rested. This is the pathway to peace. C. C. A.

Christ, the King

TUESDAY, December 17. Zech. 9 : 9. "Behold, thy king cometh." The three great offices in the Jewish commonwealth, the prophetic, the priestly, and the royal, foreshadowed the work of the Messiah. Moses, when taking leave of his people, spoke comfortingly to them of the greater Prophet that was to be raised up from among them. Aaron, the high priest, typified by his office the atoning sacrifice of the Son of God. And no sooner had Israel received a king, than also the royal office was employed by the prophets to set forth the saving work of Christ. David was told by Nathan: "When thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee, and I will establish his kingdom. I will be his father and he shall be my son." This prophecy God repeats in the second Psalm, saying: "I have set my king upon my holy hill of Zion." And when the Jewish state was wrecked and the Jews carried into Babylonian captivity, God roused the ancient hope of the Israelites for their king Messiah by the announcement which Jeremiah made to them: "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely: and this is his name whereby he shall be called, The Lord our Righteousness." The words of our text take up that ancient prophecy and repeat it to the exiles which had just returned from Babylon. Jesus is that king of prophecy: the angel Gabriel so states to the virgin Mary. It is true that Jesus refused the crown which his countrymen after the miracle of the loaves and fishes offered him, and he did not go about with the usual pomp of royalty. But he nevertheless asserted his royal dignity before the representative of the greatest potentate of the earth, Pilate, and spoke of the kingdom of truth which he has set up in the hearts of those who have accepted him as their Redeemer and love the genial rule of his evangelical word and ordinances. He is still coming as king to all whom his Gospel reaches. Let no one miss his coming through indifference or hostility to him.

Child Conversion

WEDNESDAY, December 18. Mark 10 : 14. "Suffer the little children to come unto me." A divinely moving star would not be expected to rest over a stable, but over a palace, or to point down to uncultured shepherds amid the cattle, but to gatherings of royalty and splendor. Jesus' life began in the humblest place, that he might reach down to the lowliest child. He knew that it was easier to rise to the highest when we begin with the lowest, for those who are loftiest must come down to the humility and simplicity of childhood if they would enter the kingdom of heaven.

The Christ Child is the type of the poverty and helplessness of multitudes of little ones. All may gather about him in their thought and feel at home in the lowly manger. Our Lord knew that if he could win childhood he could win the world. Is it not the great mission of the Church to win the child? With the children in the kingdom, soon there will be no more war, revenge and hatred among the nations; no more bigotry and jealousy among the churches. The wilderness and solitary places will be glad and the desert blossom as the rose; the coming of childhood to Christ will hurry his second coming. If all childhood would do as did Eva Booth, the Commander of the Salvation Army, the Lord's victory over sin and Satan would be won. Eva's birthday was on Christmas Day, and when she was seven years old she arose from her bed at night and crept down stairs to her mother's bedside, and there, she says, "in my mother's tender embrace, I sobbed out all my wish to give a Christmas present of myself to Jesus, on his birthday and my own. The wonderful new joy that came to me has made it quite impossible for me ever to doubt the absolute reality of a child's conversion."

If parents and pastors would do their whole duty to childhood, there would be a wonderful revolution in the Christian world. What if all mothers were like Susannah Wesley and Catherine Booth, training the children in the home for the conquest of themselves and for the drawing of all men unto the Redeemer? Is not this the greatest achievement of mortals? Starting right in the morning of life means going right all the way. Every child may not be a Wesley, a Luther or Knox, a Washington or Lincoln, a Miss Willard or an Eva Booth, but every one may be a child of God, in his great family, fulfilling a divinely appointed mission and living forever in the heavenly atmosphere of eternal love. Oh for the conversion of the world in the home, in the Sunday school and in the church!

Continual Praise

THURSDAY, December 19. Ps. 34 : 1. "I will bless the Lord at all times: his praise shall continually be in my mouth." Next to the blessing of a pure heart is the blessing of a thankful heart—a heart like that of Chrysostom, whose life was an illustration of the psalmist's words, "I will bless the Lord at all times." They who bless the Lord only when all goes well with them are much like the man of whom it was said, "He served the Lord off and on for forty years." "Off and on" thanksgiving is a poor kind.

It is like impulsive obedience, capricious benevolence, circumstantial piety, convenient righteousness. By so much as the eternal God is the God of our lives, we owe it to him always to pray, to give thanks in everything, to bless him at all times. If our experience has taught us anything it should have taught us this, that because we are in God's hands things are going well with us whether they seem to be so or not. Jacob learned that God was dealing mercifully with him even when he mourned his Joseph. David learned that God was gracious to him even in exile. This is the great lesson of the Book of Job. Paul was thoroughly convinced of it and affirms that the things which had happened to him which looked unfriendly to his life-plan had fallen out to the furtherance of the gospel. All things do work together for good to lovers of God. The stars in their courses fight for us. We have eternal allies. A distinguished American recently said, "I have two sons in this war. Living? That is well. Dead? That too is well. When one is right all that happens is well." One who is thus minded finds no difficulty in following the example of the psalmist who blessed the Lord at all times.

The Word and the Flesh

FRIDAY, December 20. 1 Tim. 3 : 16. "Without controversy great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh." We know the fact of the birth of God's Son, but we shall never be able to explain the manner thereof. No birth like this has ever occurred before, nor will there be a like one in the future.

And yet, if at any time a full explanation of a Scriptural fact is desirable, it is in the present instance. For in the same text in which the apostle has declared the birth of Christ "the mystery of godliness," he has also called it the "pillar and ground of the truth." On this simple fact that God became man hangs the truth of the whole Christian religion. Without this fact our religion would still be a religion, but it would no longer be the Christian religion. Over the cradle in the manger the Church of God has been reared, and the infant whom angels and shepherds and wise men from the East came to adore is the chief cornerstone of that Church. All true theology and all saving doctrine is summed up in the statement: "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." If this child had not been born, the world would be lost. From the self-degradation and self-denial which begins for this child immediately upon his birth, the apostle has drawn great moral lessons besides. He says: "The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared unto all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this world; looking for that blessed hope; and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity."

Waiting for the Lord

SATURDAY, December 21. Luke 12 : 36. "And be ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord." We are to wait with our loins girded, with our lamps trimmed and burning, going into all the world, preaching Christ's Gospel, that we may win mankind to him. For nineteen hundred years the Christian world has been waiting for Christ's return, as John the Baptist waited for his first advent, by preaching and preparing the way for the Messiah. Waiting as all the prophets waited, who toiled and prophesied, preached and warned, to get mankind ready for the fulness of time when God should send forth his Son.

The thought that Jesus is coming to reign in this world over all nationalities in his one kingdom of righteousness and peace, is the loftiest, most inspiring idea that can possess the soul. If this colossal fact should take possession of the minds of men, it would transform our world and help usher in the millennial glory. His coming will not be a humiliation, a crucifixion or a catastrophe, but a coming in triumph, as the Creator of worlds, as the Redeemer of men, as the King eternal over the universe of God. He will reign on thrones as well as in hearts, victor over death, hell and the grave, ruler over all creatures, all forces, all creations.

Queen Victoria once said to a friend, "There is nothing I should love more than to lay my crown at his feet when he comes." Should not that be the attitude of every living being—longing, loving, waiting, and, if dying before the glorious celebration, waiting in glory, to be among the escorting hosts who will come with him on his last visit to our fallen planet?

CHAPTER VII

MATTERS were in the same condition when Sunday dawned again. The Government case against Randall had been published by the local press and a sensation had followed.

Dr. Ward found he had only one theme for his sermon. During the week scores of his young people had been to see him, in addition to the boys of Company 241. The enthusiasm for the new adventure was growing far beyond anything he had dreamed. His message was a repetition of that of the Sunday before, only this time directed to the outlining of the program to be followed in carrying out the divine command.

There were many things to tell this group of young heroes of the Marne and the Vesle and the Oise, who had lived in the atmosphere of excitement and of great deeds so long that nothing trivial or unimportant had any attraction for them. And there was much to tell them of the new things at home, of which they were ignorant, many of which, like the organization of the American Missionary College and the fact of national prohibition, even if known, had to be emphasized to these eager souls looking out on a new America and into the gateways of a new world, whose every land under the sun was waiting to see what America would do to build up the world democracy she had so splendidly helped to create. The imagination of these young people was stirred to battle fervor by Dr. Ward's sermon.

AHUSH of God's spirit fell over the congregation at its close. The most thrilling assurance came to minister and people that the Christ was in the house. The carrying out of his great command to go into all the world was evidently the one thing the church needed to realize his presence. All through the years before the war no great passion had filled the church in America except the passion for self-development. Now it seemed to the people sitting there in the quiet of that moment as if a real reason for existence had been given them. Here sat all through the audience their own sons, husbands, brothers and lovers, consecrating themselves to this thrilling adventure of conquest of all the world to the sway of Jesus Christ as Lord of all. The great armies had disbanded and the soldiers had come home to go back into industrial and agricultural life. And for the first time since man began his struggle for life on the globe, a universal peace reigned, all doors were opened to the Gospel, millions were hungering for the Truth, the world was thirsting for God, and America, with her wealth practically untouched even by the war's exhausting drain, with her fields ripe with food, with her thousands of young men and women filled with the adventure of action, seemed to wait for the call of the divine reveille to awake and go forth to the greatest task that humanity ever had laid upon it, a new and glorious call to the colors of the blood-stained Cross.

Dr. Ward made no appeal for volunteers this Sunday, but that evening, after the services of the day were over, the little study at the parsonage was not big enough to hold the groups that came.

They were quiet young men, these ex-soldiers. But as their pastor Dr. Ward knew from their individual histories that he was facing heroes and spirits tempered in the great discipline of danger, and his heart thrilled as he thought of the wonderful material America now possessed for the Christianizing of the world—material full of courage, patience, endurance, intelligence, passion, vision, imagination, love of country and all it stood for—men who had known what it meant to fight for freedom and had caught more than a glimpse of what that freedom meant to the world. No such evangelizing forces had ever been known in the history of the church. His prayer as he led this expectant group was a prayer of desire that the church in America might see her great, her wonderful wealth of missionary power and use it to conquer the world for a democracy that would be Christ's.

Prayer filled the room; the hush of the Spirit's power awed this little group. And before Dr. Ward dismissed them he outlined a simple form of expression of their pledges, and they talked it over together, agreeing finally on these statements as defining in simple language their purpose and the way to attain it.

DR. WARD said in explanation: "We do not need any organization besides the church. All that these sentences are intended to do is to shape our own thought and help define it for our action. But we need to remember that Christ's commands, while eternal, are also to be interpreted in the terms and under the conditions of the age in which we ourselves live. That is the beauty of his teachings: their adaptability to every person in every country in every age and to all the world.

"Suppose, then, we let the following define for us our object, our purpose, and the means of reaching it:

"We choose for our name and motto—
"ALL THE WORLD"

"Our object is to make Christian disciples everywhere.

"We pledge ourselves to this service after careful preparation, going wherever we may be best fitted to go.

"The sources of our power we recognize to be—

(1) Jesus Christ, the Redeemer of all men, and the only real Reconstructor of the world.

(2) Faith in prayer and the daily practice of it.

(3) Faith in the Holy Spirit to show men the truth as it is in Jesus.

(4) Faith in the possible regeneration of any one of any race.

(5) Faith in a united Christendom to do what individual Christianity cannot do.

"We believe that making all nations disciples means:

(1) Working for the real union of all believers.

(2) Seeking the help of the entire nation in the use of power.

(3) Centralizing missionary effort by the union of different denominational bodies.

(4) Appealing to the heroic and adventurous in young life to do more than militarism can do to inspire courage and sacrifice.

(5) The elimination of race hatred and prejudice as a cardinal doctrine of our pledge.

(6) All our effort centers in Jesus Christ, who is alive today and all powerful in heaven and on earth.

(7) And our Creed is His Creed: supreme love to God and supreme love to fellowman.

AFTER the young people had gone home, one young woman remained with the family for the night. She is a vital part of this history, and a word is necessary about her.

Alberta Chester had been engaged to Albert Ward when the war broke out. The date had been set for their marriage while he was in training-camp. Then the order had suddenly come from headquarters which put Albert and a few other officers at a few hours' notice on a transport, and three weeks later Alberta received a cable (the first word after long days of silence) saying her lover was somewhere in France. The first letter told her that he had been one of a dozen specially selected men from the States to go over and confer with the French aviators on matters of technique and airplane construction in which Albert had begun to prove himself a rare expert. Then like a bomb out of an invisible airplane there fell on the heart of Alberta the news of Albert's death in an air duel. He had been sent up to experiment with a new type of machine, had met a German squadron, had sent down two of their planes, and had then been mortally wounded by four enemies, who set upon him in a body. He was able to guide his machine back over the French lines and died in the arms of his fellow officers, who wept honest tears over his beautiful body and buried it with high military honors in the soil of France, sending back to Dr. and Mrs. Ward and Alberta a note signed by names, some of them afterward distinguished, giving the last record of Albert's heroism, including the prayer they had found folded neatly in one of his breast pockets.

Albert's silver aviation badge finally came to Dr. Ward with his other personal effects. When the package was opened Alberta was present. She fingered with tearless eyes one little token after another, but when the little badge dropped out of a bit of tissue paper, she held out her hand and Dr. Ward let her take the symbol of the airman, and Alberta put it to her lips, and with the act her grief burst in a flood of tears that relieved her breaking heart. Without a word of protest Dr. Ward saw her pin the badge on her dress, and there she wore it always.

ALBERTA CHESTER was neither, in her own feeling, maid, wife, or widow. The vision and the memory of her lover continued in her almost like a sainted personality, enshrined in her soul, something that might have been a lover husband, father of beautiful children around whom her arms might have been enfolded as she with him trained them into noble lives for the good of the world.

She was not a girl to live in the solitude of her grief. She had been very practical in her thought and action. And so Albert's death did not materially change Alberta's daily struggle. Her old mother had been dependent on her work, and she had been a stenographer in one of Rufus Randall's offices at $60 a month. As the war went on and man after man was drafted and went away, other places were vacant. The station agent at the Bradford railway station enlisted. To the consternation of Dr. Ward and all of Alberta's friends, she applied for the position. She wanted more physical exercise than the stenographer's work could give, and in course of time the Bradford traveling public grew accustomed to see Alberta, clad in overalls, selling tickets at the window and then going out on the platform throwing trunks up on the truck, checking them, and helping the trainman shove them into the car.

But Alberta after work hours and clad in a distinctly feminine garb was another person. She sat in the family circle this Sunday evening as one of them, respected and loved for the strength and poise and endurance she had shown in the great experience through which she had passed. They were all discussing the events of the day, and Dr. Ward had just checked off all the names of those who had made definite decisions when Alberta said suddenly.

"Father, you have not put my name down."

Dr. Ward looked up in astonishment. "Alberta! You are not going to leave us!"

"I want to go to France! I want to see Albert's grave! I have been studying French language and history all winter. I can help in the orphanages! I can do reconstruction work in the orchards! I can preach the Gospel in some form to the people. I cannot bear to stay here if Esther and Dick are gone!"

And so Alberta became a part of the Great Adventure that had "all the world" for its theater, and her part was played so well that it has special importance in this narrative.

MONDAY morning following that eventful second Sunday, Dr. Ward was called up on long distance from Bayview before he was through breakfast.

Chaplain Willis Hunter's voice sounded with special and peculiar emphasis.

"Dr. Ward, I want to see you this morning if you are not too busy. May I come over?"

"By all means, Hunter. I'll be more than glad to see you."

"One of my men will bring me over in his car. Look for me before noon."

"Stay to dinner with us," Dr. Ward said; but he found that Hunter had already hung up.

Before eleven o'clock Hunter appeared in his friend's car, and his first words revealed to Dr. Ward his tremendous interest in the errand that had brought him over the forty-five miles between Bayview and Bradford.

"Yesterday I presented to my people the Great Adventure to go into all the world. And the result was so wonderful, Dr. Ward, I felt I must come over and see you about it. The Spirit was with us in great power. Seventy-five of my young people are ready to take up the Great Commission and go into all the world. We had a wonderful meeting last night. I feel almost frightened over some phases of it. Yesterday was my first Sunday home with my church. I tried to talk on my experiences and adventures. But without any volition of my own my message was directed to the Great Command. People broke down all over the church. The thing got beyond any control of mine. I do not know what it will lead to. Only, as I said a week ago when I met with the boys here, I believe the life we have just been living is comparatively uneventful by the side of this Big Thing we are going into.

"I want to counsel with you. I feel the need of all the wisdom and strength I can get. This thing is of God. If it spreads through our churches and over America it will revolutionize our church life, and what it will do in the world at large only the Divine can measure."

CHAPLAIN HUNTER spent the day with Dr. Ward. He and his churchman took dinner with the family, and Hunter had the joy of a visit with Dick, although he could not fail to detect the fact that some unusual and trying experience was being felt by this "boy" of his whose life he had saved "over there." But every one felt the contagion of Hunter's fiery enthusiasm. His last words that afternoon as he started back to Bayview was: "The age of miracles is not over, doctor. I look for the Spirit's power in this matter as I have never seen it, not even on that last wonderful battlefield across the Meuse where we were finally victorious."

That was late Monday afternoon. Dick had been roused by the visit of his old chaplain, but as soon as he was gone the depression under which he had been living since his last sight of Requa seemed to weigh him down, and after brooding in his room a while he came out of the house and walked restlessly down town.

Dick walked down one block, crossed over one of the diagonal paths leading through the courthouse grounds and, going on across the street on the other side, found himself in front of the office of the Evening Journal. An unusual crowd was on the sidewalk reading the bulletins and Dick went over.

When he caught the sense of the first note on the bulletin he heard the newsboys calling it out as they came running down the street.

"Rufus Randall convicted as a profiteer by the Government! Must serve a sentence."

That was as far as the bulletin went. Dick stopped a boy with papers and bought a copy.

He read enough after the first headlines to see that Randall had been found guilty, and unless he was pardoned by the President he would have to serve a term in the federal prison. "Requa!"

The name escaped him as he crushed the paper in his pocket.

And then, acting, as he always had, on the impulse that first prompted him, he turned out of the square toward the street where Requa lived.

When he reached the house he saw a small group of men gathered on the opposite side of the street.

Dick went on up the walk steadily, and rang the bell. As he waited for the door to open his mind was quite clear as to his action in either case, whether it should be Requa or her father who should first appear.

A World—to Live In By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE world sets us down in the heart of a great city, solemn, round-eyed country girls in the midst of Gotham. We have no kin, no money, no anything but a wild desire for happiness. If we take what is offered us, we are parasites—or worse. If we refuse the fleshpots, we are idiots. My father left me the world to make a living in, but he didn't stop to show me how to make it. Living isn't simply three meals a day and a place to sleep!" So says Rita Charles, the heroine of W. Carey Wonderley's new novel, "The World to Live In," and, having said it, she proceeds to live up to every word that she has spoken.

Rita Charles is a type of a girl that one may meet in any large city or town—the type of a girl who is earning perhaps fifteen dollars a week and has the tastes of a rich woman. She is the type of girl who wants opera instead of moving pictures—who desires model frocks instead of home-made dresses.

I read Mr. Wonderley's book with a great deal of interest. And I saw Rita Charles, the heroine, make one mistake after another, until her position was—well, scarcely a position to be desired. And then at last I saw her, the beaten follower of a false doctrine, turn away from the bright lights of Broadway to the shelter of a home—from the lure of dancing and mad merriment to love and the ways of truth.

RITA CHARLES takes the world between her two slender hands. She thinks that they are sophisticated hands—hands able to control the whirling of the sphere that she grasps. And she finds that even the most experienced hands may grow unsteady—may slip.

There is a young minister in the story. He is the pastor of a New York church—a man of the finest ideals and the highest character. He it is who answers Rita's challenge with a wholesome philosophy. He it is who counteracts the Broadway element; he it is who strives, and faithfully, to awaken the girl's sleeping soul.

"A street organ," he tells her, "can drown conscience's voice, but all the same the street organ doesn't sound the sweeter tune!"

And in the end of the story it is the minister who wins. It is the minister, with his sane philosophy, who succeeds in awakening the conscience and the heart that the street organ of life had drowned.

I TALKED a few days ago with Mr. Wonderley, the author of the book. It was of Rita Charles, his heroine, that we talked—and of other girls who are not the heroines of stories, even though, like Rita, they feel that they have been given "the World to Live In."

"A girl," Mr. Wonderley said, "who plays the game of life with nothing in her heart but the desire to take all that she can from life is rather sure to lose. It is only the exceptional girl who comes out practically unscathed, as Rita Charles did. The girl who tries to play the game of life in an unfair way is bound to lose—to lose self-respect, and charm, and high ideals. In the end she will even lose interest in the game, and when she does—well, when she does, there is nothing else left!"

"Life is not a continual round of excitement, even though there is a type of girl (and a type of man, too, for that matter) who makes life resemble a merry-go-round! Life must be something deeper, something sweeter, something surer!"

"A person can't just keep taking away from life, any more than a gardener can take all the buds from a rosebush one day and expect new roses to be waiting for him the next morning. A gardener must tend his rosebush with care, and must water it, and prune it, and cut the flowers from it tenderly, if he expects to get any lasting joy from it."

"If anything is to be taken from life, one must first be prepared to give—to give of the talents and accomplishments that have been given to one. To make life a game worth playing, one must play it fairly."

OH, friends of mine, it is impossible to be the sort of a girl that Rita Charles tried to be—to skim over the surface of life with never a glance at the bitterness and the pain and the suffering of others! It is impossible. Nothing can be taken from such a life except a shallow pleasure that any one would soon tire of.

If a man wants good water for his home, he doesn't sit down with a pitcher in his hand, waiting for rain. He digs a well. And after he has penetrated deeply enough into the earth, he is sure to come to water—good, pure, wholesome water. When a person wants to live, he, too, must penetrate into the very depths before he can know the real meaning of life.

We have all, every one of us, been given a world to live in. We have been given a glowing, wonderful world, by a kind and wonderful Father. And we must make the fact of living in his world a thing worth while. We must do something to make that world a better place—even if the something is a very small something—to show him our love and our gratitude. "We live not unto ourselves," it is said, "but unto others."

No, "living isn't simply three meals a day and a place to sleep." Living is something more. Living is making the most of life in the squarest way; living is playing a game fairly; living is helping others and, in helping others, helping oneself to make good in the best possible way!

toys, if it is the kind of place where they sell the genuine Japanese things. The tiny toy rabbits, frogs, butterflies, beetles, parasols and mice can be bought two for five cents and put in the middle of a crêpe paper flower, inside a walnut shell, or wrapped up in paper and tucked inside a hollowed-out apple, for surprises. Oranges make pretty ornaments for the tree; so do apples; and mixed candies can be hung separately by threads from the boughs. The things chosen for the tree will of course depend largely on the taste of the family and the amount of work the children wish to do; but it will probably be voted that half the fun was in getting ready; and many of the things can be used next year if put away. What Should Children Eat Between Meals?

All mothers should remember this:

There are grain foods now which taste like nut confections. They come in the form of bubble grains, airy, crisp and flavory.

Children revel in them.

They float them in bowls of milk.

They eat them dry like nut meats, if you crisp and lightly butter.

Every Food Cell Blasted

These Puffed Grains are steam-exploded—puffed to eight times normal size. Every food cell is blasted, so digestion is easy and complete.

They are prepared by Prof. Anderson's process, so they do not tax the stomach.

These are primal foods at mealtime. Two are whole grains made wholly digestible.

But between meals and at bedtime they have added importance. Children can eat them to their hearts' content.

There is nothing else so suitable.

There is nothing so delightful.

But change about. Serve one Puffed Grain today, another kind tomorrow. Each has its own enticements.

In the morning some serve with cream and sugar, and some with melted butter.

For light luncheons and suppers they are served in bowls of milk.

For eating dry they are crisped and lightly buttered.

They are used in soups, in candy making and as garnish on ice cream.

Which can unlock the secret chambers of success; can throw wide the doors which seem to bar men from the treasure house of nature; it is for those who are wise enough to understand, broad enough to weigh the evidence and firm enough to follow their own judgment. This may seem to be too good to be true, but when you remember that by the touch of a button or the turn of a lever, science has placed almost infinite resources at the disposal of man, it is evident that there may be still other resources not generally known, but which contain even greater possibilities. Joseph Cares for His Kindred

International Sunday School Lesson for December 22
Gen. 47:1-12

The Privilege of Providing for One's Own

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WE close our study of the patriarchal period of Hebrew history with the beautiful account of the reception of Jacob and his sons by the Pharaoh of Egypt, whose appreciation of Joseph was manifested by his courtesy to his family. The tale is of interest historically because it tells of the coming of the Hebrew tribes into the land of Goshen, where they came into contact with a great and antique civilization that left its impress upon the ancient world. To us its "human interest" is even greater, as we ponder the immense results of the loyalty of a mistreated boy. The powerful simplicity of the narrative causes us almost to see the vivid tableau: the powerful ruler on his throne, gracious to these nomadic herdsmen because of his debt to their brother; the aged father, bowed under years and sorrows; and the manly and magnanimous premier, feeling no sense of embarrassment as he presents his humble kindred to the court. The dignity and benignity of Jacob matches that of Pharaoh himself in their delightful colloquy, and earth's mightiest potentate bowed his head to receive the benediction of the trembling old patriarch who years before had caught his vision at Bethel. "Few and evil have been the days of the years of my life!" Yet he had seen a hundred and thirty years! Life's regrets are poignant indeed. At the remembrance of our mistakes and our failures the time seems brief and ill-spent.

"And Joseph nourished his father, and his brethren, and all his father's household, with bread, according to their families."

The First Duty of All

Paul the direct puts this matter of caring for one's kindred in its rightful place among the duties of life: "If any provideth not for his own, and specially his own household, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an unbeliever." In several of his letters he reaffirms the priority of claim of those who have cared for us, so much so that we are inclined to believe that the Gentile world must have fallen below the Hebrew ideal conspicuously in this respect.

And indeed nothing can atone for this sort of ingratitude. In George Eliot's masterpiece, "Romola," we have a classic incident of this sin, where Tito Melema, the gifted Greek, proves himself the very opposite of Joseph in our story. Tito's whole destiny is determined when he is ashamed to acknowledge poor old Baldassare, his foster-father, to whom he owed so much. When Baldassare, shipwrecked, enslaved, fleeing for freedom, laid hold on Tito's arm in the crowd, Tito flung him off, exclaiming, "Some madman surely." One reads on, expecting, finding, the moral failure of a life that held great promise.

Shakespeare's "King Lear" is the awful tragedy of a king who gives his kingdom to his daughters, only to be turned out to die. Yet many a parent has unselfishly provided for sons and daughters, only to be ignored at the last and left to shift for himself. "How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is to have a thankless child!" The grief and disappointment of heart are worse than mere adversity. Conversely, when children's lives are high and fine and when their gratitude is manifested, father and mother are content, whatever their worldly state.

What royal mothers there have been! How miraculously they have kept and cared for their own! The boy at college little knows the sacrifice of things attractive to a woman's heart that has made it possible to send the greenback that appears each week in his letter from home, sometimes two dollars, sometimes five, or only one. He may wonder how she does it. What shall he do in return? Perhaps he does not even write his weekly letter! Especially after he has come to independence and success he may forget all these things, like Pharaoh's butler. It is more essential to write a loving letter to the old folks at home than even to write very large checks for charities abroad.

An Immigrant Family History

How often has one phase of this tale of the migration to Egypt been repeated in American life! The son or daughter came first to the land of plenty—in the old days from England or Ireland, more lately from Italy or Russia—and attained some measure of success, seldom like that of Joseph! Then the old people were sent for. What scenes there have been at Ellis Island, where aged Jacobs marveled at the wealth and the dress of Joseph in the new country! One of the brighter lights in the life of New York's East Side is the wonderful care of many children for their aged parents. Not long ago I learned of a venerable Hebrew, a veritable Jacob leaning on his staff, whose comfort was assured by regular monthly allotments from every one of his grateful children. Consequently he enjoyed a dignified and beautiful old age, surrounded by his books, clothed in his long robe, all his wants supplied.

Who Are Our Own?

The Christian Church has led its people to think in terms of the larger family, brothers and sisters in Christ Jesus, cared for by one Heavenly Father. Unostentatiously, hiding from the left hand what the right hand is doing, the deacon's fund or fellowship fund carries on its benevolent work for the brother or sister in distress. The great fraternal and benevolent orders are an outgrowth of this same Christian spirit of the larger brotherhood. What wonderful incidents there are in the history of the primitive Church! Within the generation after Christ's Commission was given, Jews were caring for Gentiles they had never even seen, and Gentiles were ministering unto Jews far across the Great Sea. Paul turns from his marvelous chapter on the Resurrection to remind the Corinthians of the collection for the Palestine Famine Fund! There was no incongruity in his mind; to provide for the needy of Christ's Church was as essential to the Gospel as the Immortal Hope!

In this spirit the American people have regarded the millions of soldiers and sailors as members of one great national household. Through the United War Work Campaign they have provided the comforts and thought of home for the lads far away. It was not hard to raise immense funds, because we were only "caring for our own."

But Christianity regards a still wider fellowship as having a claim upon us. Unto the uttermost parts of the earth runs the Christian spirit of ministry. Missionary gifts will pour in new volume now for the heathen and the alien, no matter where they live and struggle. The world is our parish, and all the needy are our neighbors. Every child, yea, every sinful man or woman, is a possible brother or sister beloved in Christ. Like Timothy in Ephesus, our missionary representatives in all lands treat "the elder women as mothers, the younger as sisters, with all purity."

The Christmas Lesson

This picture of a happy family reunion is after all a mighty good Christmas scene. The spirit of Christmas is essentially that of loving gifts of parents to children, even as God gave us his unspeakable Gift, and of grateful tokens of appreciation by children moved by the Christ whose prayer-thought was "Father, I thank thee!" After two thousand years of Christ, our family circle is vastly wider than that which was known by even a whole tribe in the days of Jacob. So we must see to it that our Christmas joy reaches out beyond the fireside to the whole wide world.

This Home Repair Guide Free To Every Tire User

No matter what kind of tires you use, send your address and we will mail you, without cost, one copy of this valuable new repair guide.

Now that most service stations are running on short hours and tires are costly and hard to get, it is more important than ever that you repair your own tires and make them work out every dollar that you put into them. "Guide to More Tire Mileage" tells just what you've always wanted to know about repairing—

Inner Tubes	Rim Cuts
Valves	Tread Blowouts
Under inflation	Fabric breaks near bead
Street car track wear	Blowouts
Small inside fabric breaks	Misapplication of chains
Tube Punctures	Bad alignment
Rut-worn casings	Plain cuts
	Tread patches, etc.

These and many other causes of tire wear illustrated in halftone reproductions of actual worn tires. This valuable book is free to you regardless of what kind of tires you use. Don't wait. Send your address while these books last.

In Tireland the Miller Cords are ranked the phenomenal tires. They gained this prized position by introducing Uniform Mileage and also the tread that is Geared-to-the-Road. These tires wear alike under like conditions because of their uniform handwork. They are oversize and elastic, and give and take as they roll along, thus neutralizing road shocks. No motoring sensation is comparable to riding on Miller Uniform Cord Tires. And no tires cost you less per mile.

Marion Harland's Corner

Constituents Take Post-bellum Counsel Together

PEACE does not at once link hands with Prosperity. In God's own good time we shall see the union of the two. Now it is our sacred duty to practise the lessons we have been learning of thrift and judicious economy. A New Jersey member says:

I found hominy a good addition to some of the war breads. Can you tell me which is more economical to use, yeast cakes or liquid yeast? Please print answer in the Corner. I do enjoy it and profit by it.—MARY E. (New Jersey).

You violate no rules in using liquid yeast, and the cost of the several kinds of yeast differs little, if at all.

Maybe I could tell our readers something that would be helpful, and thus add my bit. I am a woman sixty-six years old, but take just as much interest in life as ever. It is only when I look in the glass that I realize this house I live in has changed. I will send my recipe for

Ginger Cookies

One cup of sugar; one of molasses; two-thirds of a cup of shortening; four tablespoonfuls of buttermilk; one egg; one even teaspoonful of soda, sifted in the flour; salt to taste; one level tablespoonful of ginger; wheat flour enough to make rather soft dough. We like these very much.

From a Montana correspondent we have an attractive recipe:

Loaf Made from Cowpeas

Will you admit the homely cowpea to the list of "kindly fruits of the earth"? It's think it deserves the honor; also that the loaf compounded in obedience to this recipe may take a place at the foot of the board when meat cannot be had at decent prices.

One quart cowpeas.
One pint bread crumbs.
One and one-half teaspoons chili powder.
One-half pint chopped beef.
One and one-half teaspoons salt.
One egg.

Cook cowpeas one hour in salted water. Then remove from water and add bread-crumbs, meat, chili powder and salt. Mix thoroughly. Break egg and mix thoroughly again. Put into a well-greased baking-dish and cook (covered) three hours.

Other kinds of meat may be used instead of beef, and all scraps and left-overs may be used to advantage in this loaf. A red pepper or cayenne can be substituted for the chili powder. The egg may be omitted if so desired.—BESS N. (Oklahoma).

A Colorado member, whom we have all come to recognize gratefully, has a new idea for us.

I always settled my coffee with white of egg in the good old days before the war. I felt that if I made one egg-white do for two drawings of coffee, I was doing very well indeed. But last winter, with eggs at seventy-five cents per dozen, and not always obtainable even at that price, I naturally had to revise my methods of making coffee. This is the plan I hit upon for making egg-coffee à la Hoover. Place the white of one egg in a shallow bowl or soup-plate. Beat stiff and dry, then add as much finely ground coffee as the egg will moisten well. Stir carefully to see that all the coffee is moistened, then set aside to dry, and it is ready to use. One heaping teaspoonful of this coffee, wet with a little cold water, should be used to each teacup of boiling water. This makes a good clear coffee, at considerable saving of eggs, as two or three whites used in this way will treat a pound of coffee.

Here are two recipes on widely separated lines which were crowded out of the Corner in weeks gone by, but which are worthy of being called back into their forfeited places:

Cornmeal and Cheese

Two cups yellow cornmeal, one cup grated cheese, one tablespoonful salt, two quarts of water. Put the water in the top of a double boiler. When boiling add the cornmeal slowly, boil until thick. Set the top of the boiler into the bottom and boil for one hour; remove from the fire, add salt and cheese and stir until cheese is melted; pour into a square pan, which has been brushed with oil or drippings; smooth the top and brush with oil; when cold cut in half-inch slices and brown on hot greased griddle.

Orange Marmalade

Wash, wipe and cut into shreds a dozen oranges. Leave half of them unpeeled. If they are juicy and sound, you need not insist upon having the finest fruit for this purpose. An inferior orange may be made into delicious marmalade. In your desire to stock your cupboards well for coming seasons, do not lose sight of what should be the ruling spirit of the nation nowadays—economy. Extract the seeds of the oranges and use but half of the rind. (N. B. You may shred the rest and dry it for flavoring custards, etc.) The rind must be cut very thin. When all are ready, measure pulp, juice and peel and allow three-quarters of a pound of sugar to each pint. Put into a stone crock and stir in the sugar. Cover closely and set in a cold place all night. In the morning pour into your preserving kettle, and after stirring up well from the bottom to make sure the sugar is dissolved, bring gradually to the boil and keep it at that, until the rinds are very tender, and the rest of the marmalade is clear and begins to thicken. Let it cool before turning it into glass jars with closely fitting tops. If properly made it will keep well and improve with time. It is one of our most popular marmalades.

Your interesting Corner is being watched by thousands who have followed your items of interest to women; it might be that among them there are those whose appetites have been affected by the Spanish influenza. For the convalescent from this disease, will you suggest that jelly with cream be eaten? You who know of many choice recipes for jellies can add to those I mention—grape, lemon and orange.—M. A. V. (New York).

Steamed Corn Bread

Two eggs; two cups of buttermilk; one-quarter cup of molasses; two even teaspoonfuls of soda; salt to taste; two heaping cups of corn meal; one even cup of flour; stir and beat well. Steam three hours and set in the oven long enough to dry off.

I have other recipes that are good and cheap, if you would care for them.—Mrs. J. K. (California).

This new correspondent has a timely message for the victims of the worldwide plague that slew in its sweep more than the sword. She speaks intelligently and from personal experience.

"GOOD and cheap" is a combination of words that catches the eye of every wise housemother at this season. Nor should it be necessary for me to reiterate what all members of our Corner Club should know by heart before now, namely, that it is my earnest desire to make this—our especial Corner—a veritable Housewife's Exchange. I wish that every woman, North, East, South and West, who reads this paper and is interested in this department would share with her fellow-housekeepers all over the country and in every town, whatever has helped her in her profession of homemakers (and there is no nobler in the world!), and confide to them the tale of her difficulties and perplexities. She may be sure of finding help and sympathy from some quarter—probably from a dozen. Tell us, through this medium, of trials and failures and successes. Don't cast about for fine words and stilted phrases that you think will look well in print. Speak to us after your own fashion—as you might to the young housekeeper who runs in between daylight and dark to tell you that her bread was sour at the last baking, or the older and experienced neighbor who yet would learn of new methods of making the old dishes taste like new. I would have you take counsel together over these cognate themes, and that the Corner should be to you all—

CHURCH Committees planning patriotic services will find "Over the Top," a Christian battle song, by Walter J. Powell, an acceptable addition to the list of new music available for such occasions. If there is anything of a memorial nature connected with the service "The Christian Soldiers' Memorial Hymn," by Rev. J. M. Lyons, D.D., will be found comforting and sympathetic. The music for both of these is by William W. Bentley. They are published by The Olivet Publishing House, Beaver Falls, Pa., at 5 cents each.

The Week in the World's News

POSTAGE RATES RESTORED. In completing the draft of the new War Revenue Bill the Senate Finance Committee, on November 29, included an amendment which provided for the elimination of the zone system of postage on second-class mail matter which has forced all publications to increase their subscription rates. The bill as drawn provides for the return to pre-war postage on first-class mail and on second-class mail within 200 miles of the office of mailing, with a rate of 1½¢. per pound beyond that 200 mile radius. Another amendment provides for a ten per cent. tax on the net profits of factories employing children under the age of sixteen. Taxes on automobiles were eliminated from the bill.

NOBEL PEACE PRIZE FOR PRESIDENT. Dispatches from Christiania of November 27 indicated that the Nobel peace prize for 1918 might be awarded to President Wilson.

TO TRY WAR PLOTTERS. The Socialist Government of Germany, on November 30, proposed to the Entente nations that all nations produce their secret documents and that a neutral commission be established to fix the blame for the war. At Vienna, on November 28, it was reported that movements were in process to bring to trial Count Berchtold and Count Czernin, the former Emperor Charles and a number of Grand Dukes and Generals. In Germany Von Bethmann-Hollweg and his successors as German Chancellor were declared guilty with the Kaiser, while the Bavarian cabinet created consternation among those who were seeking modification of the armistice terms by making public the diplomatic correspondence between Berlin and Munich, which passed before the war began in 1914, and which showed conclusively that Berlin and Vienna were plotting together. Meantime France and Great Britain were preparing to demand the person of the Kaiser from Holland, and Holland was reported on November 30 to have appointed a commission to report on the legal status of Wilhelm in Holland. The formal abdication was made public November 30. The former Crown Prince has been exiled by Holland to the Island of Wieringen.

NATION BUYS SHIPS. It was announced, on November 26, that the United States Government had purchased the fleet of eighty-three British vessels of the International Mercantile Marine Company. Altogether the deal covers ships with an aggregate gross tonnage of 730,000, and the price was put at $90,000,000.

WIDER SUFFRAGE IN RUMANIA. It was announced, on November 25, that the Rumanian Government had issued a decree for universal suffrage. Later reports told of a peasant uprising, and pictured Bucharest in flames.

CALIFORNIA GOVERNOR EXERCISES LENIENCY. Governor Stephens of California, on November 28, commuted to life imprisonment the sentence of death of Thomas J. Mooney, sentenced to be hanged for complicity in the bomb explosion during the San Francisco preparedness parade in July, 1916.

ALLIED WARSHIPS IN BLACK SEA. Dispatches from Paris, on November 25, announced that the Allied warships had passed through the Bosphorus and were in the Black Sea, and had made a tour, stopping at various ports along the southern shore of the sea in Turkish Armenia. The Allied squadron went to Odessa and took over from the German crews the former Russian Black Sea Fleet.

SPAIN APPROVES LEAGUE OF NATIONS. Both Chambers of the Spanish Parliament, on November 22, approved in principle the proposal of the suggested League of Nations.

GREATER SERBIA. Crown Prince Alexander of Serbia was, on November 26, appointed Regent of the Jugo-Slav

State by the National Council, meeting at Agram. The State Council included delegates from Serbia and Montenegro and was to meet at Serajevo. Elections are to be held soon for the Constituent Assembly. Montenegro was reported, on December 21, to have deposed King Nicholas.

CROSSING THE RHINE. General von Marwitz, German 5th Army, began crossing the Rhine on Friday, November 29, using three bridges. The crossing was expected to take eight or nine days. American, French and British armies, waiting to occupy the hostage provinces, followed the German withdrawal, the Americans on November 30 being over twelve miles inside the former frontier with their headquarters established at Treves. It was announced on November 29 that the troops would be brought back home through the ports of Boston, New York, Newport News, Va., and Charleston, S. C., and that it would be ten months before all the troops could be returned. The British transport Mauretania reached New York City with 4,400 troops from England, on December 2.

PREPARING FOR THE DRIVE. The American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief is to have its "drive" January 12 to 19. To secure volunteers to help during the coming campaign in the Metropolitan district, several mass meetings are scheduled for December 12, at the Central Congregational Church, where Dr. S. Parkes Cadman will speak; the Bushwick Methodist Church, the South Reformed Church and at the Plymouth Congregational Church. The Staten Island meetings will be as follows: At the Moravian Church Parish House, New Dorp, and at St. George's Academy on December 15.

FIVE BILLION DOLLAR LOAN IN APRIL. Washington dispatches of November 27 announced the Fifth Liberty Loan would be offered to the nation some time in April and that the amount would be about $5,000,000,000.

A WORLD THANKSGIVING. America's Thanksgiving Day was celebrated by all nations and by all creeds. President Wilson attended the Central Presbyterian Church in Washington. In New York Jews, Gentiles, Catholics and Protestants were all represented in a great solemn Thanksgiving Day service at the Episcopal Cathedral of St. John the Divine. In London and Paris American celebrations were participated in by officials and people. Uncle Sam made preparations for a great Thanksgiving feast in the camps at home and abroad.

PERU AND CHILE DISAGREE. As a result of the anti-Peruvian rioting in Iquique and Antofagasta on the part of Chilians and Bolivians, Peru, on November 25, withdrew her consuls, the consul at Antofagasta having been attacked on the preceding Saturday. Considerable hard feeling exists between Chile and Peru as a result of the Tacna and Arica controversy. Peru was reported to have decided to submit the controversy to the Peace Conference.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. French engineers are reported to be planning an international railway from Bordeaux to Odessa, the plan including a tunnel through the Vosges mountains. The line will run from Bordeaux to Lyons, then through Milan, Venice, Trieste, Agram, Belgrade to Odessa. Most of the railway links are already constructed, the uncompleted links lying largely in the territory now known as Jugoslavia. . . . With the retirement of Admiral Knight in December Vice Admiral Sims, commander of the American naval forces abroad, will be advanced to the rank of Admiral. . . . More than 1,500,000 prisoners of various nationalities had been released on November 27 by the German authorities. . . . The United War Work Campaign for funds for the Y. M. C. A. and society organizations resulted in the total subscription up to November 25 of $203,179,038. . . . The American casualties of 262,723 cover just about a year of fighting, the first casualty being on the Marne-Rhine Canal November 1, 1917.

He declared that he would be in close touch with affairs on this side of the water while he was gone and that the Congress would "know all that I do."

He closed with this appeal: "May I now hope, gentlemen of the Congress, that in the delicate tasks I shall have to perform on the other side of the sea, in my efforts truly and faithfully to interpret the principles and purposes of the country we love, I may have the encouragement and the added strength of your united support? I realize the magnitude and difficulty of the duty I am undertaking. I am poignantly aware of its grave responsibilities. I am the servant of the nation. I can have no private thought or purpose of my own in performing such an errand. I go to give the best that is in me to the common settlements which I must now assist in arriving at in conference with the other working heads of the associated Governments. I shall count upon your friendly countenance and encouragement. I shall not be inaccessible. I shall be happy in the thought that I am constantly in touch with the weighty matters of domestic policy with which we shall have to deal. I shall make my absence as brief as possible, and shall hope to return with the happy assurance that it has been possible to translate into action the great ideals for which America has striven."

When the nation was called to arms, the women answered, too. Into the shops, the fields, the Red Cross workrooms—wherever their willing hands could help, they went.

Swift's Premium Calendar for 1919 shows how four of our country's greatest artists have been inspired by the wonderful way Uncle Sam's Daughters are "doing their bit."

Haskell Coffin's "Fighter of the Field" is helping to produce the "food that will win the war." And Neysa McMein, whose attractive pictures are winning such a remarkable reputation, painted this driver in the Motor Transport Service—who looks ready for any call! Clarence Underwood, of Saturday Evening Post fame, outdid himself when he painted this charming Red Cross worker, whose devoted hands never tire of turning roll after roll of snowy gauze into much needed surgical dressings. And the Christy girl, making munitions or airplane parts, is lovelier than ever!

Paintings beautifully reproduced in colors

Each picture is ten and one-half inches high, and there is no advertising on the front. The rich colorings of the original paintings are reproduced so artistically that you will enjoy keeping them in your home long after the calendar has served its original purpose. Send for it today.

How to get this calendar for 10c in coin or stamps

thus have foretold; if man had been the doer he could not thus have fulfilled."

I think all the Allies may feel a great satisfaction, a great comfort, in the fact that, notwithstanding the immeasurable sufferings and horrors of the war, they, at least, are God's instruments fulfilling his foreordained and foretold will. What God said of Cyrus, they may feel he has also said of them: they "are my shepherds and shall perform all my pleasure." It is worthy of remark, too, that Cyrus, in common with all his generals and soldiers, who were Zoroastrians, who were worshipers of the true God, said that "they were fighting in the cause of God against the principle of Evil; that they were fighting for Truth against the Lie." Now, surely the Allies may say that they have been doing the same. They have been fighting for God against the powers of evil, for truth against the lie. The Germans have said in words and deeds: "We have made lies our refuge, and under falsehood have we hid ourselves"; but God has now "swept away their refuge of lies," and the waters have "overflowed their hiding-place." A new sun has risen on our world, bringing a new year—ushering in the time, we trust, when "a King shall reign in righteousness," when "righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins"; when "they shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

Young People's Topics for December 22

Peace on Earth

Christian Endeavor, B. Y. P. U. and Epworth League Topic: Luke 2: 8-14

AT last the boys are out of the trenches, and the Christmas season finds our hearts overflowing with joy in anticipation of the blessings of peace. No longer does the daily press carry the official reports of actions at the various fronts. Instead we read of gatherings of statesmen engaged in the preliminary discussions which are necessary to the organization of the final conference, where will be shaped the agreement on which peace will rest. The last verse of the reference is frequently rendered "Peace on earth to men of good will," but however we render it the fact remains that the peace of the world must rest upon the mutual good will of the peoples of the world; the love of Christ ruling in the hearts of men. The love of Christ must break down every barrier of class and clan; it must erase injustice; abolish tyranny, whether it is the tyranny of authority due to birth, or of power due to position. The Allies may put down Bolshevism in Germany and Russia by force of arms and impress peace upon the Reds, but unless food is brought within reach of all at fair prices, unless labor is given its fair share of the wealth it produces, the seed of Bolshevism will remain, and may ultimately eventuate in a terror worse than the terror so recently ended. The young people of the world should pray that the statesmen responsible for the terms of the peace treaty may be given wisdom from on high in order that the document upon which the peace of the future shall rest may be a guarantee of undisturbed tranquility. It will be no easy task to realize such a document. It can only be done by men moved with the spirit of Christ, and if it is so done it will eventually result in the outgrowing of the antagonisms existing at present and in the bringing about of that world-wide good which will be the assured guarantee of peace. "Peace on earth" sang the angels above the hills of Bethlehem. That peace fills the heart of each believer who accepts the Risen Saviour. The peace of Christ thus given cannot be taken away by any human struggle or any worldly sacrifice, and the peace of the world will be still further guaranteed when the majority of its millions shall have found this peace which passeth understanding.

An Invalid's Mite

MRS. A. W. of Norfolk, Va., writes: "I received your notice some time ago, but have had sickness that prevented me sending this name, and I still have cataract on my eyes. Please pray for me. God bless you in all your work for him in this time of cruel war. I have a grandson at the front, who has been in battles. I enclose a dollar for you to use in your good work as you think best. I am seventy-five years old."

This gift will be used, with others, to help feed the sufferers in stricken Armenia and Syria.

On Wednesday afternoon, Dr. Pettigill spoke on "The Apostasy," and Dr. Torrey on "The Final Answer to all Modern Forms of Infidelity," and they both had a royal time of it. The Philadelphia Dean denounced those having "merely a form of godliness," also the "itching ears," the "false teachers," the "false prophets," and those "bringing in damnable heresies"; whilst Dr. Torrey in contending that the "visible and glorious return of Christ" would be a "final answer to every form of modern infidelity," showed no kind of delicacy in particularizing. His list included infidels, pure and simple, destructive critics of the Bible, teachers of false doctrine, and all "would-be world conquerors and rulers." Both speakers held very pessimistic views of future happenings until Christ comes, and of the rapid degeneration of morals in these days, but both were joyfully optimistic in view of the near approach of the King. They evidently communicated their enthusiasm to the audience, for the responses were louder than ever, the singing more joyous.

In the course of his address, Dr. Torrey made reference to his contribution to a Christian Herald symposium on Universal Peace seven years ago. Basing his prognostications on Bible prophecy, he claimed that he had foretold exactly the events that have recently happened in the great war.

The evening meeting was devoted to consideration of the fulfilment of prophecy in regard to the Jews. The first address was given by Dr. Gabelein on "The Capture of Jerusalem and the great future of that city," the second by the Rev. W. B. Riley of Minneapolis, on "The Coming of the Lord, the Hope of Israel." Rev. Arthur J. Smith of New York City presided.

ON THANKSGIVING morning, Mr. Alexander aroused the audience to a pitch of musical enthusiasm in its singing of "My Country, 'tis of Thee." Then came the reading of the President's proclamation. The beautiful passage toward its close in which the President says, "A new day shines about us, in which our hearts are filled with new courage, and we look forward with new hope to new and greater duties," seemed like a breath of fresh air through an open window.

I wonder how many who were present will agree with me in the opinion that the three addresses given at the morning meeting of the Conference were the very best of the whole proceedings. The first was that of the chairman, Mr. John E. Milholland, of New York, who insisted that nothing is more neglected, and nothing more vitally important, than a painstaking and scientific study of prophecy. The second address was by the Rev. J. W. Kemp of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, on another neglected subject, the most neglected in the Evangelical Gospel, he called it—viz., the resurrection from the dead.

The third speaker was Professor W. H. Griffith Thomas, of Toronto. He modestly called his address a Bible Reading; but it was a masterly setting forth of the "Influence of the Study of Prophecy upon the life and service of a Christian," as contained in Paul's two epistles to the Thessalonians.

THE afternoon meeting was presided over by Mr. William Phillips Hall, and was addressed by Dr. James M. Gray, Mr. G. Pertelevitch Raud of Russia, and Professor W. H. Griffith Thomas. Dr. Thomas was also the principal speaker at the closing meeting of the Conference, his topic being: "The Prince of Peace." Never shall we have an abiding peace until the Prince of Peace comes. He is the Way of Peace, to the individual and to the nations. Dr. W. B. Riley was the other speaker, but his voice giving way, Dr. Torrey came to the rescue, and took up the subject, "What it means to the Saved when the King comes."

Thus came to an end a very memorable gathering. Hopes were held out by Mr. Wm. Phillips Hall and others that similar Conferences will be held in other great cities, and in so far as they draw attention to the general question of prophecy they will doubtless grow in interest and benefit. Meanwhile, the Master's word is still: "Watch, therefore; for ye know not on what day your Lord cometh."

Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman with his eloquence; Bishop W. F. Anderson, with his patriotic address, a prohibition classic, bearing a personal message from Lloyd George to the American people; Bishop F. J. McConnell, who dug down deep as he always does with his philosophic instinct, and made application of universal principles to this world-wide war on evil; Bishop S. E. Nicholson, so broad-visioned with such a knowledge of world-wide wants and remedies; Bishop G. M. Matthews, a level-headed pioneer of prohibition; Mr. S. S. Kresge, so wise in organizing the business men of the nation; Father J. J. Curran, the friend of the poor; State Superintendents and others made able addresses.

Dr. Russell said: "There is great danger that the friends of sobriety will fold their hands and expect prohibition to enforce itself. Appetite and greed will still exist. 'Eternal vigilance is the price of security'. One of the best results of international organization for world-wide sobriety is this: We shall keep our army at hand, strong and alert to hold the fort which has been won. So it may be said we are to 'Leave our country for our country's good'. It will be for the good of other lands, no less, to give to them the truth which shall make them free."

Dr. P. A. Baker in his opening address paid tribute to the pioneers and martyrs of prohibition. If Frances Willard had not organized the W. C. T. U. long before the birth of the Anti-Saloon League, the latter would not have been. It is because the League has federated the church and temperance forces so well that it has had such signal success. It will do the same thing in its fight for universal prohibition. It will work in harmony with the W. C. T. U., which has its branches in every nation on the globe; with the Good Templars, which have their lodges in so many countries; with honored temperance organizations older than the gravest of us; with the pioneer international temperance and prohibition organizations.

After appropriate Scripture lesson and song, Dr. Russell preached a short sermon, looking toward world conquest, and then called the delegates to come forward and kneel at the altar and consecrate themselves to the new task. The whole audience came forward, and a dozen or more volunteered short prayers. To such men, with such a cause and with such faith in God, there can be no such thing as failure.

How to Get What You Want

A Remarkable System of Personal Efficiency

Taught by Dr. Orison Swett Marden, the world's greatest inspirational writer, who has helped thousands of discouraged men and women to brilliant success

NO matter what you want—whether it be wealth, power, position, fame, health, friendship, or any kind of material success—it is no longer necessary for you to grope for it blindly, uncertainly, wasting your energy and brain power in an unequal struggle against circumstance and environment.

There is a sure and certain way of reaching your goal, of attaining your desires, of realizing your ambitions. There has been worked out for your guidance, a definite plan of action which if followed intelligently will put you on the road to assured success. So clear, so simple, so explicit are the instructions that anyone can grasp their meaning quickly and put them into practice. A single hour devoted to their study may change the course of your whole life. Many a man who had thought himself possessed of only moderate ability—yes, many a self-confessed failure—has suddenly found himself a new man mentally and spiritually, with a wonderful new power of accomplishment, new courage, new ambition and new opportunities for success, simply by following the suggestions given him by Dr. Orison Swett Marden.

Dr. Orison Swett Marden

What Great Men Say About Dr. Marden's Teachings

THEODORE ROOSEVELT says: "I am so deeply touched and pleased by your editorial in 'Success' that I must write and tell you so."

CHARLES M. SCHWAB says: Dr. Marden's writings have had much to do with my success."

JOHN WANAMAKER says: "I would, if it had been necessary, have been willing to have gone without at least one meal a day to buy one of the Marden books."

LORD NORTHCLIFFE says: "I believe Dr. Marden's writings will be of immense assistance to all young men."

JUDGE BEN B. LINDSEY says: "Dr. Marden is one of the wonders of our time. I personally feel under a debt of obligation to him for his marvelous inspiration and help."

When such men as these, and a host of others too numerous to mention, have felt so strongly the debt of gratitude they owe this man that they have not hesitated to acknowledge it in writing, surely you also can be helped to develop your latent powers, to fill a larger place in the world, to make a new success of your life.

There is nothing mysterious or difficult about Dr. Marden's teachings. They are clear, direct, personal. You will recognize their truth and their value to you as soon as you read them. And that they may have wide distribution throughout the world they have been put into a book called "How to GET WHAT YOU WANT" (instead of into an expensive mail-order course costing from $20 to $50) so that they are within easy reach of everyone who reads this announcement. And then there is THE NEW SUCCESS—MARDEN'S MAGAZINE, which every ambitious man and woman should read in connection with the book, as it is brimfull of the success idea and carries Dr. Marden's inspiring message to thousands every month. By special arrangement both the book and an eight months' subscription to the magazine can now be secured for only $2. Nor is it necessary that you risk a single penny to secure them, as Dr. Marden has stipulated that his book and magazine shall be sent on five days' free examination to every reader of The Christian Herald who asks for them.

COLOR VIEWS of the HOLY LAND

10 WONDERFUL VIEWS OF THE HOLY LAND FREE

HERE is a great opportunity for you to secure without a cent of cost ten beautiful reproductions in full color of the most famous and accurate Holy Land paintings that have ever been made. These works of a great artist have preserved to the world the Holy Land of Bible days, that country known and loved so well by our Saviour.

In the past you have known the Holy Land only through the most meager and uninspired dressings, none of them presenting this wonderful country in its true beauty and charm. Now you are offered masterpieces that put before your eyes the entire birthplace of Christianity as Christ himself knew it. For the first time ten of these views in all the beautiful tints and shades of the land itself are offered you absolutely free.

Like a Visit to Palestine

AS YOU look at these pictures you feel that you yourself stand with the artist on the slope of Olivet and look across the valley of Jehoshaphat, through which winds the old road to Samaria, and beyond, under the bright sunshine, you see the walls of Jerusalem. Through these works of art you travel the Jordan road as did our Saviour so many years ago. You visit the Pool of Bethesda, and the tomb of St. James, and feel the charm, the beauty, and the dignity of every sacred place. These reproductions are in themselves a trip to the Holy Land.

David Roberts, of the Royal Academy, made the long trip from England for the purpose of painting the most famous scenes of biblical history in order that the Christian world might have truthful pictures of the birthplace of the religion. He expressed in water-colors the scenes of Christ's life and activities, as well as many things of historical interest in Egypt and the Nile country, the very cradle of modern civilization, which he visited while on his way to Palestine. Reproductions of ten of Mr. Roberts' great paintings have been made and are now offered you free in folio form.

With each of the ten pictures goes a complete description of the scene depicted with mention of the historical and biblical interest that attaches to the place. Every student of the Bible and every person interested in the life and progress of these early days will appreciate the beauty and value of these reproductions, both as works of art and as illustrations of the great scenes in scriptural history.

Picture Folio Free

THIS is a special offer and is strictly limited by the supply of the picture folios that have been completed for distribution. Fill in the coupon below with the name of a friend or relative who is not now a subscriber to the Christian Herald, and to whom you would like to send it. Mail it to us with 25 cents, in stamps or currency. The name of the new subscriber will be entered at once for a ten-weeks' subscription to the Christian Herald. The folio of reproductions in color, twenty-four pages, will be sent you free of charge upon receipt of coupon. Fill in your name also and mail it to us at once, so as to be sure of your folio. Do this now while you are thinking of it. If you prefer we will send the booklet to the new subscriber.

CHRISTIAN HERALD SUBSCRIPTION OFFERS

"JERUSALEM—Its Redemption and Future"

IT is only now that the real story of the Redemption of Jerusalem can be told, and it is that story which the Christian Herald presents in the book entitled "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future." It tells the story of conditions in the Holy City before the War. In vivid detail it relates the experiences of the people during the years of the War itself up to the present time.

THE book reads like the unfolding of a vast drama, one of the grandest ever known.

The redemption is not confined to Palestine, but includes all the Bible lands: Syria, Armenia, Arabia, Mesopotamia, the old country of the patriarchs, and even the "Eden Land"—the cradle of the human race.

We will send a copy of "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for One Year, for $2.75 ($3.25 after January 1, 1919.)

We will send a copy of "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00 ($2.50 after January 1, 1919).

"Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," separately, $1.00 per copy, postpaid.

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY"

Report of the Philadelphia Prophetic Conference

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY" links up the prophecies of the Bible with the great events of today and shows conclusively that we are living in an age of prophetic fulfillment.

When we set out several months ago to print "Light on Prophecy," we felt that it was a book which our readers would welcome. It held something that very many good people want to know. The result, however, far exceeded our expectations. "Light on Prophecy" has now passed through four large editions, and the demand is still growing.

We will send a copy of "Light on Prophecy," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50 ($3.00 after January 1, 1919).

We will send a copy of "Light on Prophecy," postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00 ($2.50 after January 1, 1919).

"Light on Prophecy," separately, $1.00 per copy, postpaid.

"OH, MONEY! MONEY!"

By Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Pollyanna," etc.

"OH, MONEY! MONEY!" is a romance of a New England Cinderella and a Western millionaire. "If you don't know how to get happiness out of five dollars, you don't know how to get it out of five thousand," says Maggie, the cheery philosopher of "Oh, Money! Money!" and this is the keynote of Mrs. Porter's latest story.

We will send a copy of "Oh, Money! Money!" together with the Christian Herald for one year for $2.75 ($3.25 after January 1, 1919).

We will send a copy of "Oh, Money! Money!" postpaid to Christian Herald subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00 ($2.50 after January 1, 1919).

"Oh, Money! Money!" separately, $1.50 per copy, postpaid.

"A GREATER CHRISTMAS"

By Rev. A. Edwin Keigwin, D.D., Pastor, New York City.

THE approaching Christmas is to be the most inspiring since the birth of Christ, and the Messianic story will make a greater appeal to the hearts of men than ever before. Dr. A. Edwin Keigwin has written a Christmas gift book that has a special message for the opening hours of an era of reconstruction. It is entitled "A Greater Christmas." The book is delightfully seasonable.

We will send a copy of "A Greater Christmas," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year for $2.35 ($2.85 after January 1, 1919).

We will send two copies of "A Greater Christmas," postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00 ($2.50 after January 1, 1919).

"A Greater Christmas," separately, 50 cents per copy, postpaid.

BIG AMERICAN FLAG—4x6 FEET

EVERY good American should show his colors these days. Let "Old Glory" mark your home as one which stands by our President, our army and our navy. Celebrate our victories by displaying this fine symbol of our national unity. Show your flag on holidays, when the boys come home, fly it for parades, reunions, and patriotic occasions. Let this big flag tell the story of your joy in this great moment of our country's history.

We will send one of these Flags, postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year for $3.50 ($4.00 after January 1, 1919).

We will send one of these Flags, postpaid to Christian Herald subscribers who send us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald at $2.00 each ($2.50 each after January 1, 1919).

Questions and Answers

SUBSCRIBER, New York. "It may be news to many readers of the Christian Herald that prohibition has almost as great an antiquity as anything in human history. The Bible tells us that the Rechabites forswore all drink, but national prohibition is nowhere mentioned in the Scriptures. A missionary friend in Korea sends me occasionally a copy of a missionary magazine published in Seoul, the capital, and a recent number discusses prohibition, showing that in the year 38 A.D. an edict prohibiting the manufacture of strong drink was promulgated in that country and that similar prohibitions have occurred again and again, until comparatively recent times, the last being in 1876, when the king officially ordered 'No more drink!' The records tell of King Se-jo issuing an enactment against drink and sending out messengers to ascertain if the royal will was being complied with by nobles and peasants alike. In 1423 A.D. King Se-jong, though only twenty-six, when urged by his primo minister to take liquor as a tonic, replied, 'When I forbade my people the use of intoxicants, how can I use them myself?' His official edict against the liquor evil contains some passages that might have been written in our own time. He points out the wasteful use of grain, the destruction of the hearts and souls of men by drink, the disgrace it brings to the drunkards and all connected with them, and the human wrecks that men become, 'stripped of their diviner nature, with all decency thrown to the winds.' This good king's edict even cites cases of drunkards as far back as 206 B.C. Se-jong seems to have been an exceptionally able monarch. He raised his country to a high state of civilization, and in his day Korea 'went dry.' Other prohibition kings were Choong-jong, aged twenty-five, who reigned in 1512; Hyo-jong (1636), who attributed most of the misfortunes that befell the state to drink, and Sook-jong (1675), who ridiculed booze and its victims in clover poems. All of which shows that Korea has a national conscience, and until she imported the drink habit from European nations her people were probably the soberest in the world."

Mrs. T. R. G., Pittsburgh, Pa. Simon, described in Acts as being attracted by the wonderful miracles of the apostles, became their disciple and was baptized. His object, however, was not to learn for the sake of the good, but to acquire the miraculous power of the apostles, that he might make money out of it. That he was not sincere is shown by Peter's denunciation of him in Acts 8:9-24. Early church historians wrote that he gave the apostles much trouble afterward, but in every encounter was signally defeated.

Old Friend. He is my neighbor to whom I may be able to render even the smallest Christian service. Be he good or bad, rich or poor, he is my neighbor if I by any act or word can wean him from sin and help him to a better or happier life. The beathen are savage and cruel; yet we take the Gospel to them and win them by love, even at the cost of many a martyr. We must not judge harshly of others; indeed, it is better not to judge at all, as judgment belongs to God alone. Our plain duty is to do the best we can to those who are near at hand, and leave the result to the Lord.

S. H. Keinefelder of Honolulu, Hawaii, writes us that he could use old copies of the Christian Herald to advantage in Christian work there. He will be glad of any copies our readers may send him.

Anxious. Please explain Acts 19:2.

The more accurate translation of this passage is: "Did you receive the Holy Ghost when you believed?" Something had occurred which led Paul to suspect the imperfection of their spiritual light. They had no communication with any other Christians and they admitted their ignorance. Paul saw they had neither authority nor power, and because of their defection in this respect, he set about to instruct them.

Mrs. G. W. L., Ohio. Please explain Col. 2:8.

This passage contains a warning against being carried away by those who sought to make the early Christians a prey to some new attractive, popular philosophy which is not based on the eternal Word. "To spoil," in this connection, does not mean to make vain by flattery, by adulation or by giving one a wrong impression of one's importance, but to betray, mislead, capture or destroy. The translation in the Revised Version may be helpful. It is "Take heed lest there shall be anyone that maketh spoil of you."

B. S. E., Indiana, Pa. 1. Buying shares in a legitimate enterprise is not gambling. We do not advise in such matters, however. 2. The other question has been referred to the Prayer League.

F. C. H. writes us as follows: "There is no one state religion for the entire German empire, but each state has its own state church. In Prussia, and that is what you perhaps had in mind, they have a combination or union of the Lutheran and Reformed religions. In Bavaria, the second in size and population, the Roman Catholic religion is the state religion. Saxony, the third in population, still has a Lutheran state church. Its king being a Roman Catholic, the State Secretary together with two other members of the Saxon cabinet, must sign all religious laws."

H. J., Jr., Bowles, Calif., writes: "I thought that I would write you and let you know (1) that I truly enjoy reading your paper, for it seems to be all that its name implies, a true Christian paper, and I have gotten much benefit from reading it. But of late I have not been getting it regularly. My wife told me that she had written you that our address had been changed, so please don't miss sending me the helpful and clean paper. (2) I like the articles in the June 26 issue of the Herald in the Daily Meditation by Rev. E. W. Caswell, for it brings us to the things of today. While the armies are fighting for democracy over there with the sword, why not let all of the Christian editors and artists and others fight for it at home with the pen? For we are told that the pen is mightier than the sword. Now I feel that the Christian Herald could do much in bringing about the desired results here and give democracy to the stranger within our gates, and I feel that you could do this by (1) occasionally publishing in your paper the pictures of some of the regiments that we have over there, the Negroes included. (2) When time and space allow, tell of the heroic deeds that were performed by some soldier, giving his name and nationality when permissible, and in doing this I believe you will be acting what Lincoln said in words: 'Charity to all, malice toward none.' Now, when we read of the cruel deeds that the Germans commit against those that fall into their hands, it almost makes us stop and wonder if the Lord still lives, and we are glad that our young men and old ones are giving their lives to rid Europe and Asia of such treatment, and to make those lands better places to live in; but how about the Negro, the stranger within our gates? The Negro, as you well know, has never been a slacker, and under every condition he has shown himself a man. The Negroes have given their sons freely and gladly; they have responded nobly to the Liberty Loan and bought War Savings stamps, and in fact done everything in their power. When we are taking fathers and brothers and sending them over there, can't you as an editor take just a little time and show the great host left behind that we appreciate what they are doing? The Negro is submissive, kind and obedient. I believe he learned this from carrying a part of the cross of Christ (Luke 23:26.)"

In justice to the race whose cause the writer of this letter champions so well, we print his letter. Our Negro soldiers at the front, as the records show, have fought bravely, and those who are left in the homeland have done and are doing their "bit" for the country and the war in full measure.

Poultry Authority Makes Prediction

It is my opinion that this is going to be the largest year that poultry raisers have had. I predict that eggs are going to retail for $1.00 a dozen this winter. I base this prediction on the fact that right now eggs are selling at 65c and 75c in some of the large cities.

E. J. REEFER
America's Poultry Expert

This means $1.00 a dozen for eggs by the first of the year, if previous seasons can be taken as a basis of calculation.

The poultry raiser, amateur and professional, who gives his poultry business his serious attention, this winter, and who spends a little money on the upkeep of his hens, is going to cash in, in a way never before dreamed of.

As America's foremost poultry expert, the foregoing are my serious convictions.

Gets 45 Eggs a Day Instead of 2 or 3

"Increase to 45 Eggs a Day"

Since I began the use of your "More Eggs" Tonic, two weeks ago, I am getting 45 eggs a day, and before I was only getting 2 or 3 a day.
DORA PHILLIPS, Derby, Iowa.

"Finishes Moulting—Lays Quick"

Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic did my old hens good, for as they got through moulting they began laying.
E. G. McCALL, Williamsburg, Pa.

"Doubled Eggs in Canada"

I am very much pleased with your "More Eggs" Tonic, as my hens have more than doubled their eggs.
MRS. ANDREW FALK, Vanarsdol, B.C., Can.

"Gets Winter Eggs"

It is the first time I got so many eggs in winter. When I began using "More Eggs" I was only getting from 1 to 3 eggs per day and now I am getting 11 to 13 eggs per day.
MRS. JULIA GOODEN, Wilburton, Kan.

"Plenty of Eggs Now"

I have been using Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic for three weeks. When I started our hens were only averaging us 1 egg a day out of 100 hens, and we are getting plenty of eggs now.
T. E. TATE, Armored, Ark.

"Astonished the Neighbors"

Am well pleased with results of "More Eggs." As I took my eggs in to the store today, people asked where did I get all those eggs.
H. J. WESTFALL, Lenora, Kan.

"Tripled Egg Production"

About one month ago I ordered 1 package "More Eggs" Tonic. I have been giving it to my hens and they have tripled my egg production. I am sending you a postcard photo that I made on January 13, 1918. Those two full buckets, as you see, of eggs were gathered from a flock of 25 hens in ten days.
O. F. MURPHY, Glen Rose, Tex.

"More Eggs" Makes $300"

I used "More Eggs" Tonic during the winter. I was able to sell $300 worth of eggs in 1917. Good record.
JOSEPHINE BEVARD, Derby, Iowa.

"Selling Eggs Now"

I was not getting an egg when I began the use of the "More Eggs" Tonic. Now I am selling eggs.
MRS. J. F. BRINK, Hebo, Ore.

"Hens Were Transformed"

I never saw such a transformation as in my hens since giving them "More Eggs". They have recovered from the disease and are laying straight on every day.
MRS. T. T. BANKS,
100 Rowan St., Fayetteville, N. C.

"More Eggs" is Wonderful"

Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic is wonderful. Before we used it, we were only getting one egg a day; after using it three weeks we got 12 eggs per day.
HOWARD D. MARROW, Gibsonia, Pa.

"From No Eggs to 37 Eggs a Day"

That "More Eggs" Tonic I got awhile back is just simply grand, the best thing I have ever used. When I started using it they did not lay at all. Now I get 37 eggs a day.
EDGAR A. J. LINNIGER, Elwood, Ind.

"Started Hens Laying in 2 Weeks"

Your Egg Tonic has started my hens to work, and I haven't used it two weeks yet.
MRS. W. HUNTER, Aubrey, Ark.

"Increase from 8 to 36 Eggs"

I am well pleased with your "More Eggs" Tonic. I was only getting 8 or 9 eggs a day; now I am getting 3 dozen a day.
WM. SCHMIDT, Shady Bend, Kan.

"More Eggs" Did the Work"

"More Eggs" Tonic did the work. I was only getting one or two eggs per day and some days none, and now we are getting nine to twelve per day.
E. H. CARWILE, Chanute, Kan.

"Sister Bartholomen Praises It"

I tried your "More Eggs" Tonic last year and certainly had success. With heartiest greetings, SISTER BARTHOLOMEN, Villa Ridge, Mo.

"More Eggs" Vitally Necessary"

We find Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic of very great importance when desiring "More Eggs" from our flock.
W. O. SMITH, Oxford, Mich.

"Getting Lots of Eggs"

I am very well pleased with Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic and I am getting lots of eggs.
O. DERVEN, Jr., Bell City, Iowa.

"More Eggs Now Than for Two Years"

We received the other order of "More Eggs" Tonic and have used it as to directions. I am getting more eggs now than I have for the past two years.
J. R. P. MUNROE, Gallipolis, O.

"Doubles Egg Production"

I have been using "More Eggs" Tonic 3 or 4 weeks and must say it is fine. My egg production has been doubled.
J. C. KOENINGER, Paradise, Tex.

"Wants to Introduce It"

"More Eggs" Tonic is the best thing I ever used, and I want to introduce it to my friends and neighbors.
WM. GREENBALGH, Absecon, N. J.

EGGS $1.00 A DOZEN

Demand Greatest in History
Eggs and Poultry to Stay
At Top Notch Price

Higher Now Than Any Time
Since the Civil War—All
Poultry Raisers to Profit

At no time in the history of the country since the Civil War have eggs and poultry been in such demand. It is reported by all the large cities that the cold storage supply has been just about exhausted by the enormous demand made by the European powers. It is estimated that a million cases of eggs have been exported since the first of September and unless dealers in cold storage can get immediate new supplies, it is predicted that eggs will bring a dollar a dozen by January, and that fattened poultry will bring from 30 to 40c a pound killed. Right now, fresh eggs are selling at 65c a dozen in such cities as Philadelphia, Baltimore and New York, and it is predicted they will sell for $1.00 by the first of the year.

These top notch prices have excited a great deal of activity, not alone in the markets, but among the small poultry raisers and among the farmers' wives, who raise fowls. One man who raises poultry on a large scale has contracted to supply a New York hotel with guaranteed fresh eggs from now till Feb. 1, at 60c a dozen and fattened fowls at 35c a pound dressed. He says these prices will be obtained very easily and that the ordinary poultry raiser could double and treble his profits, if he would keep his fowls toned up with a good laying tonic and keep roush out of the flock. These are two simple precautions and with the present outlook anyone who neglects these things is simply robbing himself of just so many dollars per week.

It is also stated on authority that cold storage dealers as well as all large buyers are now demanding fowls that are in perfect condition on account of the huge export trade in these stocks and when they are barreled and sent abroad they have to be in prime health and those eggs also are in heavy demand which are being sold on a guarantee of being absolutely fresh. This is going to be a great year for the poultry raiser, both large and small, and various sources already report more scientific care and study of fowls, due to the above mentioned rigid demand and the enormous call at big prices for perfectly fresh eggs and fattened fowls. With the advent of cold weather, there will be a loud call for eggs at fancy prices.

Keeping the hens toned up and in good laying condition is going to pay the poultry raiser better this winter than ever before.

160 Hens—1500 Eggs

Mrs. H. M. Patton, Waverly, Mo., writes, "I fed 2 boxes of 'More Eggs' to my hens and broke the egg record. I got 1,500 eggs from 160 hens in exactly 21 days." You can do as well. In fact, any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called "More Eggs." Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs," and you will be amazed and delighted with results. "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit maker, send one dollar to E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 2499 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., for a full sized package of "More Eggs" or send $2.25 on special discount for 3 regular one dollar packages—a full season's supply. Remember a million dollar bank guarantees to return your money if you are not perfectly satisfied. You run no risk—send for your "More Eggs" today or ask Mr. Reefer for his valuable poultry book free that tells the methods of a man that has shown thousands how to make money out of poultry.

Eggs Paid the Pastor

I am so thankful to you, Mr. Reefer, that I can't express in words how much I have been benefited by your "More Eggs." As to eggs, I've got more eggs than I ever did, and am highly pleased with everything that I bought. My friends are now waking up when I tell them that "More Eggs" is the remedy for me. I've paid my debts, clothed the children in new dresses, and even bought John a new shirt—and that is not all—I paid my Pastor his dues, and have money to help those who have never heard the old story of "Jesus and His Love," and as I write this beautiful morning, the cackling of the hens are praising "God from Whom all blessings flow." I can safely say your Roush Remedy is all O. K. I sold 42½ dozen eggs last week, set 4 dozen, ate some and had 1½ dozen left. From your friend,
MRS. LENA McBRON, Woodbury, Tenn.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWS WEEKLY FOR THE HOME

ALEPPO, THE BEAUTIFUL

By Professor Edgar J. Banks

ONE afternoon, just before the outbreak of the great war, I was emerging from the Arabian Desert. For several months, with a guide and a cook (Arabs from Bagdad), and with three camels to bear us and our baggage, I had been wandering in Arabia searching for lost cities. We had been sleeping in the open desert, wherever night overtook us. The only human beings we had seen were the wild Arab herdsmen who grazed their camels in the pasture-land far from the rivers. For days the only subject of conversation was the wonderful city we were approaching.

As we approached Aleppo, the deep ruts or paths worn into the desert surface by the long lines of camel caravans appeared everywhere. The little domed shrines where the desert traveler stops to rest and to pray became more frequent. Small villages of conical clay huts, like huge beehives, and little patches of grain and of melons, were evidence of a larger town beyond. Finally on the horizon appeared the peaks of tall minarets, then the great citadel beyond, and the domes of the mosques. A little brook flowed sluggishly along between its shores of green. The street within was wide and paved. The neat one-story, flat-roofed houses of stone seemed like palaces in contrast with the desert huts.

As a carriage drawn by horses came rushing along, our camels shied at the unusual sight. For more than an hour we urged the unwilling animals along, stopping only when a policeman or a soldier halted us to examine our passes. At last we entered the han or inn, and the kneeling camels grunted in relief. We had reached civilization. With the aid of the American consul, I was provided with European clothes, and an entire week was spent in exploring the future capital of the new kingdom of Arabia.

ALEPPO lies on the edge of the Syrian desert, a half way between the Mediterranean and the Euphrates. It is about 1,200 feet above the sea. Rome was built on seven hills; Aleppo boasts of eight, but they are very low. Higher hills nearly surround it. Through the city runs a little river, the Kuwaik, or the Chalus of the ancient Greeks. It is an insignificant stream, rising some distance to the north and losing itself in the great marshes about fifteen miles to the south. For miles along its shores are beautiful gardens and orchards and the summer homes of the wealthy. There are groves of maple and plane and olive and quince, and there in the rich black loam the pistachio and melons, as delicious as any in the world, are wonderfully productive. The little river does more than convert the surrounding desert to gardens; it is the chief water supply, and it yields an abundance of eels and other fish.

The older part of the city is surrounded with walls of stone masonry about three and a half miles in circuit, but now they are in a dilapidated condition. Seven gates lead within. The town is divided into several quarters. In the northwestern part live the Europeans and Christians. In the northeastern is the Levantine quarter. Nearer the center are the Jews, and to the south the Arabs and Turks. The entire population is estimated at about 180,000, of which two-thirds are Mohammedans. There are 12,000 Greeks and 12,000 Jews, and a lesser number of Armenians, Syrians and Europeans. The language is divided about equally between Turkish and Arabic.

The men of Aleppo have never enjoyed a good reputation among the desert tribes, for they delight in fine clothes and are more Europeanized even than those of Damascus. The streets are paved, and are wider and cleaner than in most other Oriental towns; many of them are bordered with good sidewalks. All of the houses are of stone, and are generally entered beneath a pointed arch. Most of them are but a single story high, but the more imposing have a second story, and from it an alcove with latticed windows projects over the street. The arched entrance leads into an open court, which the chambers face, and sometimes the small court is decorated with fruit trees or flower beds or a small fountain. The furnishings of the houses are a mixture of European and Oriental.

IN THE center of the town, in the neat public square, is a large stone tower, and the clock at its summit strikes the hours of the Turkish day. That day begins with sunset, so that midnight and noon come at about six o'clock instead of twelve. The square is a busy place, generally crowded with carriages and pedestrians.

The bazaars of Aleppo are as interesting as any in the Orient, though not so extensive as those of Constantinople or Damascus. They are of stone, arched above, with little air holes, like windows, through which the rays of the sun pierce the perpetual twilight within. The narrow passages are always crowded with men and animals. In the little booths at the sides are goods from all the world, all that the desert Arab or the European consular official could desire. Of the native goods, laces and embroideries, the products of Jewish women, are of unusual interest. In the vegetable bazaars are great quantities of delicious melons, figs, grapes, dried fruits, olives and nuts. The climate is too cold for native oranges and dates. Aleppo is on the great highway from the Mediterranean to Bagdad and Persia. Desert roads radiate in all directions, and great caravans of heavily laden camels still come and go even as they did before the days of railroads. The chief articles of export are wool, sheep-butter, hides, dried fruits, gall-nuts for tanning purposes, gums, manna and saffron. The value of the exports amount to about $5,000,000 annually. The imports, chiefly cotton and other European goods, are of more than double that amount.

IN THE European suburbs are two or three fairly modern hotels. Within the town are numerous Oriental hans, great square structures about an open court, with little cell-like rooms where the traveler may cook his meals and sleep. But the pride of Aleppo, the thing which distinguishes it from all other Oriental cities, is the citadel in the center of the town. It resembles a great natural hill with its steep sides walled up with squared stones, but it seems that the hill is entirely artificial. It is nearly circular, about a quarter of a mile across, and perhaps 200 feet high. Its origin and age are uncertain; probably it comes from early Saracenic times, or from about twelve centuries ago. An Arabic tradition claims that it rests on 8,000 columns, and should excavations be made at its base it might be discovered that it is supported on great arched substructures. A native told me of another tradition, how long ago two brothers, the sons of an Arab king, came to the place and there decided to build a city. As none of the natural hills were high enough to serve as a citadel, they built one. They began the work when mere boys, one on each side, and when the hill was completed they were old and gray with age. Certainly the citadel of Aleppo is unique and one of the most imposing works of man. It is surrounded with a wide moat which may still be filled with water. Its vaulted entrance leads over a beautiful stone bridge of a single arch, to a tall square tower with rounded edges. Stone steps ascend to the upper chambers and the turreted summit. Beyond the tower, steps supported by a series of arches lead upward into a great square vaulted vestibule of a most of Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist. At the side of the mosque stands a minaret 180 feet in height and coming from about the year 1290.

It is said that Damascus is the oldest city in the world, or the city which has been inhabited for the longest time, but a similar claim may be made for Aleppo. Egyptian inscriptions of about 2000 B. C. mention it. Probably then it was an old Hittite city, for several Hittite inscriptions have been found on the stones built into house walls; one of them still remains in the wall of one of the mosques. Hadad, the Syrian deity who was worshiped at Damascus, was also worshiped here, for the Assyrian king, Shalmaneser, says that in 864 B. C. he offered sacrifices to him in Aleppo. The city was then called Haleb. A Seleucid king later enlarged it and changed its name to Berœa. Since then Aleppo has been the scene of many a struggle. The Persians, the Byzantines, the Arabs, the Crusaders, the Mongols, the Mameluke kings of Egypt, the Tartars and the Turks have fought for it. Fires have burned it and earthquakes have thrown it down, but the city was so favorably situated that it could not die. The caravans continued to halt there. The French, the Venetians, and finally the English, attracted by its mercantile possibilities, built factories there, and at the close of the sixteenth century Aleppo was one of the great trading centers of the world. Then the route around the Cape to India was discovered, and the overland trade by caravan declined. But Aleppo has again come to its own.

Aleppo from the citadel imposing appearance. Upon the walls are sculptured basilisks, leopards and serpents, and an Arabic inscription from about 1209 A. D. Down beneath are great cisterns, and above are chambers. Climbing still higher you stand upon the summit of the wall surmounting the citadel, and from there the best view of the city is obtained. Until a century ago the summit of the citadel was covered with houses; traces of the streets may now be seen, but only a mosque and a minaret, a bath and a few barracks for soldiers remain. Everywhere else are ruins. It is seldom that strangers have been allowed to enter the citadel, but with the governor's permission I was permitted to wander about and photograph whatever I would, but always under the guard of about thirty soldiers.

THE best of the buildings for religious purposes is the Great Mosque standing on the site of an ancient church which is said to have been built by the empress Helena. It protects one of the several tombs

Several years ago it was connected by a railroad with Damascus and Beirut. The new German road from Constantinople connects it with that city. Soon it will be connected with Bagdad and Persia and India. Already it is an important railroad center, through which all overland communication between Europe, Asia and Africa must pass. When the dormant Orient is really awakened there is no city in the near East more favorably situated for the trade of half the world.

This is why the Arabs have selected Aleppo as the capital of their new kingdom. Here, in close contact with European civilization, the Arab rulers may teach the desert tribes to cease their tribal warfare and unite. No longer under the oppressive yoke of the Turks, they may grow strong and wealthy, not by the sword as in the days of Mohammed, but through peace and industry. If wisdom guides the Arab rulers, then again tales of wealth and splendor as wonderful as any of the Arabian Nights may be told in the streets of the new Arab capital. Again the Arabs may climb to be among the foremost of civilized nations.

The market place in Bethlehem and the Church of the Nativity

Bethlehem Prepares for Christmas

The Little Town of the Nativity to Joyously Celebrate the Saviour's Birth and World-Peace

ACCORDING to reports which have recently come from Palestine, very extensive preparations are now under way in the little town of Bethlehem, the birthplace of Jesus Christ, to make the celebration of the approaching Christmas season the most wonderful in the entire history of the famous place. Pilgrims from all over the Holy Land are now said to be flocking to the sacred town to take part in the festivities which will be both, religious and secular in nature, and which will last for some days.

There are many good reasons why this celebration, at this particular Christmas time, is remarkably fitting and should command world-wide attention. In the first place it will commemorate the deliverance of the residents of the Holy Land, after hundreds of years of oppression, from the Turkish yoke, and the passing of Palestine into Christian hands. No more fitting place could possibly be selected for a dignified and reverent celebration of the peace which has dawned upon the war-tired world than the birthplace of the Prince of Peace. Finally, of all the famous places in the Holy Land, Bethlehem is almost the only town of consequence which is today, and has been for generations, almost totally inhabited by Christians, Latin, Greek and Armenian.

The Bethlehem of the present is in many respects much the same as the Bethlehem of the days of Christ. Changes and modernization which are daily occurrences in the Occident come very slowly in Palestine, and of all the towns in the land of Bible story probably none have suffered less from modernization than the birthplace of Jesus.

It is still a small unwallled village of white stone houses, mostly ages old. The population is only about three thousand souls. The surrounding country is almost as interesting as the town itself.

Leaving the Jaffa Gate of Jerusalem, en route to Bethlehem, the tourist first crosses the deep valley of Hinnom below the Pool of the Sultan, and then rides up the hill on the opposite side of the vale. On every side are little farms and gardens, in which almond and fig trees are to be seen in bloom. Slowly ascending the road up to the hill of Mar Elyas, the so-called Well of the Magi is reached. Here the tradition says that the wise men halted after they had left Jerusalem, and the star reappeared to guide them on to Bethlehem.

At the entrance to the town of Bethlehem, protected by a walled kitchen, is David's well. The women of Bethlehem are a distinct type, good-looking, rather short of stature even for Oriental women, round-faced, tranquil, placid and kind of aspect. Not a few of them are rather fair and have blue eyes. They wear dark blue skirts, dark red jackets, with white veils over their heads though not over their faces. Under the veil the married women wear a peculiar cap of stiff, embroidered black cloth, about six inches high, and across the front of this cap is strung their dowry of gold or silver coins.

Donkeys, camels, sheep and hogs are common in the streets of Bethlehem, and, getting twisted up with the pedestrians, make progress rather slow. Fronting the market-place is a rambling and rather lofty rough stone building, resembling a fortress, with curious little bell-towers surmounting its roof. This structure is the Convent of the Nativity. It was built by the Empress Helena in 327 A. D., but destroyed by the Moslems in 1236, and, it is supposed, restored by the Crusaders. Within is the Church of the Nativity, around which the great Christmas celebration this year will center.

Entering the church, a curious condition of complexity is encountered. The ownership of the different altars with their gilt ornaments, of the swinging lamps, of the separate doorways of Greeks and Armenians and Latins, is bewildering. This is a place where the visiting stranger must be careful of his actions, as the representatives of the various races who control the different altars and shrines here guard their privileges and prerogatives jealously.

DARK, winding steps, slippery with the drippings from many candles, lead down into the Grotto of the Nativity. It is a cavern about forty feet long and ten feet wide, lit by thirty pendent lamps, Greek, Armenian and Latin. The floor is of marble, while the walls are hung with costly draperies. In the pavement before the altar is a silver star, which is supposed to mark the exact spot where Christ was born. In the corner is a marble manger.

Day and night during the three hundred and sixty-five days of the year an almost never-ceasing stream of pilgrims is entering or leaving the Grotto of the Nativity, kneeling and kissing the star and the stones and the altar in token of their reverence for the Founder of the Christian religion. There is no reminder of the humble scene of the Nativity as described in the Scriptures in this close and stifling grotto hung with costly silks and embroideries, glittering with rich lamps and filled with the smoke of incense and waxen tapers. Some have questioned the positive authenticity of the place. Yet it is an undisputable fact that the ancient inn of Bethlehem must have been somewhere near this spot, in the vicinity of the market place of the town.

Just to the north of the Grotto of the Nativity is the cave in which St. Jerome is said to have lived while translating the Bible into Latin.

One of the most modern buildings in Bethlehem is the Hospital of the English Knights of Saint John. Standing in beauty and cleanness and order, it is a sight to refresh the eye.

For years the natives of Bethlehem have chiefly gained their subsistence by the manufacture and sale to pilgrims and visitors to the town of crucifixes, beads, boxes of sandalwood, shells and mother-of-pearl ornaments. During the war their business was greatly depressed, and they have been reduced to poverty in consequence; but now, with the light of a better day dawning in Palestine, they are looking forward to a happier condition, and for that reason, if no other, will give hearty thanks for their deliverance and the arrival of peace at the approaching Christmas celebration at the birthplace of the Prince of Peace.

Mary the mother of our Lord might have dressed much like these women in the streets of modern Bethlehem

President Gone to Urge a Just Peace

Great Impromptu Ovation as the Transport George Washington, Bearing the Presidential Party, Passes Out to Sea

IN HIS purpose to bind the nations of the world together in a peace advantageous to all of them, President Wilson sailed from New York on December 4 for Europe, bearing with him the loyal support and confidence of the American people.

The President sailed on the United States transport, George Washington, direct for Brest, France. His itinerary abroad is not made known, except that he will take part in preliminary conferences and perhaps in the great Peace Conference itself.

The departure of the President and his party was entirely without ostentation, and all public demonstration was in spite of precautions against it.

It was a grim, gray vessel which bore the smiling President from the cluster of cheering men and women on the Hoboken pier. On the starboard bridge stood the slender figure of the President. He raised his Fedora hat, waved it and smiled as he leaned over slightly. His lips seemed to be moving in a "good-by," but the cheering and clapping of hands stifled his words.

At the President's side was Mrs. Wilson. She fluttered her kerchief and gracefully saluted the throng.

The President drew the collar of his greatcoat more closely about his throat, for a breeze that had wakened at dawn was fitfully stirring the rigging of harbor craft.

NO SHIP ever received here the spontaneous honors accorded to the George Washington. And no ship ever was so well guarded. Four destroyers and two armed naval patrol boats kept the fairway clear until the steamship was in the channel and headed down stream. The river swarmed with tugs and small craft shrieking "good-bys" and "bon voyages" with their whistles. Ferryboats swarmed with citizens who had timed their crossing of the Hudson to get a nearer glimpse of the nation's Chief Executive, and the New Jersey, Manhattan and Staten Island waterfronts were black with the throngs which had congregated to do him honor.

No sooner had the George Washington begun to slip from its berth than an airplane darted from the horizon and soared to a position directly above the President's vessel. It was joined by another aircraft, and together they sailed forward and back along the route pursued by the George Washington. The droning hum of the airplane motors mingled with the blaring "Over There" played by a band.

At 10:20 o'clock there was a thundering and screaming of whistles from all parts of the harbor, testifying to the fact that the nation's leader was off for the conference of counselors, to write and to speak more of America's ideals into the pages of history.

A destroyer, newly painted gray, fell in behind the George Washington and fired the Presidential salute as the transport moved down the harbor. Picked gunners from the United States Navy manned the guns on the President's vessel and roared back a reply.

Marines, acting as the Presidential guard, lined up along either side of the executive suite and stood at attention. It was then that the President, head bared, waved a small American flag.

As the ship swung down into the bay abeam of the Goddess of Liberty, with destroyers ahead and astern and

The President's ship on December 5 wirelessed "All well," and reported that the first morning out found her ber 16-23. The President declared that the Red Cross Christmas message of 1918 was by God's grace a message of peace as well as of good will, but that peace did not mean that we should fold our hands; that it meant further sacrifice that we might help the people of war-saddened lands back to faith in mercy and future happiness.

ALLIES CROSS THE RHINE. On December 5 the French and American armies were well inside former German territory, the French entering from Lorraine, the Americans from Luxemburg, and British and Belgian troops were also entering enemy territory. Everywhere the German public received the Allied troops quietly, sullenly, but without any obvious evidence of illwill. The Soldiers' and Workmen's Councils had cautioned the people against open hostilities, and the Allied commanders had proclaimed the intention of their armies to maintain order, but not to interfere at all with the private life of the inhabitants.

Troops of all the Allies had reached and crossed the Rhine on December 8, all German troops at that date having passed eastward of the river. The American main army was still four days' march from the Rhine, but on special request of the German authorities a battalion was sent to Coblenz to maintain order. The British acted similarly at Cologne, rushing machine-gun units into the city.

CONGRESSMAN GLASS NEW TREASURY HEAD. The nomination of Congressman Carter Glass of Virginia to be Secretary of the Treasury was sent to the Senate on December 5, and it was expected that Mr. Glass would assume the duties of his new position on December 16. He has been chairman of the House Committee on Banking and Currency for six years, the Federal Reserve Law being formed under his leadership.

CHILE-PERU SITUATION, TENSE. On December 3 Chile was reported to be mobilizing her troops, but there was no report of counter-mobilization by Peru. On the 4th the Chilean Consul-General left Lima for Santiago, taking with him all the archives. Reports from Buenos Ayres of December 6 indicated that the efforts of the American State Department were bearing fruit and that the Chilean and Peruvian foreign offices were approaching a peaceful solution of their differences.

PLANS FOR ADDITIONAL AIR MAIL LINES. In his annual report to Congress on December 5, Postmaster General Burleson again recommended the government ownership of telegraphs and telephones, and also recommended the expansion of the air mail service, reporting that plans had been formed for a service from New York to San Francisco, and for a line from Boston to Key West, going on from Key West via Havana to Panama and South America.

GUILTY MUST STAND TRIAL. David Lloyd George in a campaign address on December 5 declared that the mer airplanes circling overhead, she presented a magnificent spectacle in the glowing sunlight to the many thousands assembled on the shore. Off Staten Island Admiral Mayo's flagship, the battleship Pennsylvania, swung into line and led the way through the Narrows to the Hook and to sea.

THE President and his party arrived at Army Piers, Hoboken, at 7:40 o'clock. He came on a special train from Washington. At 8:10 o'clock President Wilson went aboard the transport. While the Infantry Band played "The Star Spangled Banner," the President stopped reverently and stood with head bared. Hundreds of flags formed a canopy over the President and party as they walked from the train along the pier to their point of embarkation.

The distinguished party included the President and Mrs. Wilson, Rear Admiral Cary T. Grayson, U. S. N., Gilbert F. Close, confidential clerk to the President; Irving H. Hoover and Miss Edith Benham, all members of the President's personal party; the French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand, the Italian Ambassador and Countess di Cellere, their two children, Mrs. Francisco Quattrons, secretary to the Italian Ambassador; American Ambassador to Great Britain and Mrs. Davis, Rear Admiral Knapp, U. S. N., Captain Pratt, Mrs. W. S. Benson, Mrs. Joseph C. Grew, Mrs. Gordon Auchincloss, Mrs. David Hunter Miller, Secretary of State and Mrs. Lansing, Henry White, Leland Harrison, 450 miles on her way. The President was pictured as alternately working at his typewriter on speeches to be delivered in Europe, conferring with other members of his party, and resting under orders of his physician.

President Wilson's ship, after weathering a two days' storm, was reported on December 7 as proceeding in a calmer sea, without incidents. She was expected to pass the Azores the next day. President Wilson attended religious services on December 8 with the enlisted men of the American forces on board the George Washington in the men's quarters below decks. The President joined in the singing, the prayers and the recital of the services.

The Week in the World's News

TO BROADEN RED CROSS SERVICE. Henry P. Davison, chairman of the War Council of the American Red Cross, announced on December 4 that the Red Cross would not need to solicit funds except through its annual Christmas roll call, that the funds thus made available would be devoted to Relief Work throughout the world, that the Red Cross would stay with our soldiers and sailors wherever they were until they were demobilized, and that nothing would be left undone for the men in the war zone, for those returning, for those in camps and hospitals, or for the families at home. President Wilson in a proclamation made public December 8 called on every American to join the American Red Cross during the Christmas Roll Call week, Decem-

A Christmas Peace Has Come

AFTER nineteen centuries of conflict the world today stands in the dawning of a Christian peace. Always eloquent, Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis finds here a theme that stirs his powers. He brings the message next week.

Peace from clash of arms is bringing, too, a new spirit of accommodation among men in ideals and in spiritual endeavors. The spirit of Christian Unity, abroad in the land, is fast fusing denominational differences into a wide zeal for souls and the pure Gospel. Next week we will open the way to a long step forward.

Wealth is not joy, nor position happiness; but each may minister to both. Next week Miss Ladden of Laddensburg discovers the talisman in her wealth and position.

Next week also Dr. Clark relates the second portion of his recollections, telling of two happy pastorates; we go to a Christmas tree in Japan; we see the President safely off to France, and welcome our boys home.

Brown Boxes

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE toy-shop window was decorated for Christmas time. There were strange, funny animals in it, and mechanical trains—there were paint-boxes and make-believe pianos. There were doll chairs, and doll tables, and whole wonderful doll houses. And there were dozens of dolls, all grouped, like court ladies, about a marvelous doll who sat like a queen in the very center of things.

It seemed to Ella that she had always wanted such a doll. It seemed to her that there had never been a day when the blue-eyed vision of it had not smiled just beyond her reach! With her nose pressed, button-like, to the plate glass of the toy-shop window, she drank in the many beauties of it—its long curling hair, its real eyelashes, its satin frock. There were even tiny buttons on the doll's kid shoes; there were even silk socks that ended just below the doll's dimpled knees. It was a super-doll; and Ella, watching it, prayed a futile little prayer.

"O God," prayed Ella, "please let Santy Claus bring me a dolly like that one—if there is a Santy Claus!" she added. For she was a careful child, and she couldn't be sure even of Santy Claus. Last year he hadn't come at all, or the year before. And this year—well, there was no telling.

The doll smiled at her from the toy-shop window; smiled with a smile that was almost unbearably sweet. Ella, sick at heart, turned away from the sight of it. Her common sense told her that even a Santy Claus couldn't do miracles. And to be given a doll like the one in the window would be little short of a miracle.

VERY much farther up-town, Eleanor lay quietly in bed. She was a very sick little girl, was Eleanor, and she looked across the toy-filled nursery with wan eyes. It was a beautiful room, the nursery, a room that breathed the very essence of childhood from the illustrated Mother Goose rhymes that danced around the walls to the embroidered fairy-tales that were a part of every pillow sham and coverlet; but Eleanor was too weak to care.

"It's only"—it was her daddy speaking—"it's only a few days until Christmas, honey! Aren't you glad? Think of all the new toys that Santa Claus will bring for you!"

Little Eleanor turned restlessly on her pillow. "Santy Claus brought so many toys last year and the year before," she told her daddy, "that I don't think there's anything new left for him to bring this year. I wish—" She left the sentence unfinished, and her daddy stole out of the room. His lips were a tiny bit shaky and he rubbed his eyes.

"If I could find something that would interest her," he said very softly to himself—"if I only could!" And then he added, "If she only had a mother! A mother would know what she needed!"

Leave almost any little girl's daddy alone at almost any present-buying time, and ten chances to one he'll bring home a doll. And so Eleanor's daddy, being a true-to-type daddy, left the house and walked abruptly into a certain toy-shop and placed himself in the willing hands of the head clerk. "My little girl is ill," he told the head clerk, "and I want to buy her the most beautiful doll in the world for Christmas!" And the head clerk, being a woman of nice discrimination, smiled a knowing smile and took a certain doll from the very center of a certain window and wrapped it carefully in a brown box. "This is the most beautiful doll in the store," she told Eleanor's daddy as she tied some string around the box. "I'm sure your little girl will love it!"

Eleanor's daddy took the parcel under his arm and walked out of the shop. He walked a bit gropingly because he was very much afraid that his little girl wouldn't be well enough to love even the most beautiful doll in the world. He hung his head and winked hard, so that curious passers-by might not know that his eyes were rather misty. He turned a corner, and—

There was a man coming, very fast, around the corner; a man who walked with his head bowed; a shabby man who carried under his arm a brown, string-tied box. Eleanor's daddy, who wasn't seeing very well just then, ran into him and the two brown boxes fell, together, into the snow that banked the gutter. It was dirty city snow, but it was soft, and the boxes lay on it unhurt.

"Sorry," muttered Eleanor's daddy, as he stooped blindly for his package; and

"Sorry," grunted the shabby man as he stooped for the package that he had dropped. And then they walked silently past each other with heads still bowed, each in his own way.

The shabby man's way led downtown—it ended in a shabby tenement room on a side street that was more than shabby. He entered the room in a furtive way and hid his box behind a pile of rubbish on a high shelf.

"I'll let her open it herself on Christmas," he said. "Poor little tyke—it ain't much of a doll, at that! But she's been talking doll an' Santa Claus so hard, and for so long. . . . I

"Things would-a-been different—if her mother'd lived."

AS FOR Eleanor's daddy—well, Eleanor was worse when he reached home. And so he just forgot all about dolls—until Christmas morning.

For at last it was Christmas morning. And Eleanor, propped up against her pillows, looked wearily through her stockings—the stockings that an extravagant Santa Claus had filled to overflowing.

"This is a lovely ring," she said wistfully. "It's not very much like my others—and these beads and books"—her little mouth quivered—"are so pretty. Santa Claus was an awfully nice Santa Claus—"

It was her daddy, sitting beside her on the bed, who called her attention to the brown box that lay among the other gifts.

"Open that, dear," he told her gently. "I'm sure there's something especially lovely—"

Eleanor was already fumbling with the string. She jerked it off quite as interestedly as a well child would have jerked it off. And then she opened the brown box, and took out—a doll.

Eleanor's daddy leaned forward with a quick exclamation of surprise. For the doll that Eleanor lifted out of the brown box was the strangest doll that he had ever seen. It was a cheap rag doll—a rag doll with shiny button eyes and a calico frock—a small rag doll with a painted grin that was persistent and engaging.

"Why, that's not—" he began, and stopped before the sheer delight that shone on his little daughter's face.

"Oh, daddy," she was saying "Oh, daddy! I never saw a dolly like this one! It's the nicest dolly—why, it's soft, like a baby, to hug. Oh—I love it!" And she kissed the rag doll squarely on the persistent painted grin. "I'm so happy," she whispered at last; "this has been the most wonderful Christmas!"

AND away down at the other end of the town another little girl was waking from sleep—waking to greet the morning of Christmas. And another daddy was watching her with a great wistfulness in his eyes—another daddy who held in his arms a brown box.

"Merry Christmas, Ella," said the other daddy as her heavy eyes unclosed. "Santy Claus has been here—he came last night. And he left this box for you. He said as he hoped you'd like it."

Little Ella was out of her tumbled bed so fast that the covers almost seemed to fly about her. And the box was in her hands before you could say "Jack Robinson." And the string was off of it, and the layers of wrapping paper, and she lifted out—a doll.

It was the daddy that spoke, at last, and—"Why—" he stammered, "where—" But he stopped before the rapture in his small daughter's eyes. He couldn't tell her that it wasn't the doll that he had bought—he couldn't, for she thought that her doll was from Santa Claus! And he tried not to think about the other little girl who was cheated out of her Christmas gift (one wishes that he might have seen that other little girl sleeping quietly for the first time in weeks with the rag doll snuggled to her cheek!) For the doll that Ella was staring at was a queen of dolls, a doll radiant from the curls of her head to the silk socks that stopped just before her dimpled knees.

"Oh, daddy!" she was whispering. "It's the doll. Oh, I didn't never s'pose I'd get it. I prayed ter God, I did, and he answered me. I asked him ter tell Santy Claus that I wanted th' doll, an'—" suddenly she was appealing to her daddy—"and he must've told Santy Claus himself! Oh, daddy! do you s'pose—he did?"

The daddy's eyes were wet as he bent to kiss his small daughter. One of his shabby arms drew her close.

"I reckon, Ella," he said huskily, "that he did!"

When a man says, "I am debtor to all men," encourage him by saying, "Pay up, brother; pay up!"

The selfish man, who would squeeze this old world as he would squeeze an orange, says, "No juice!" but the unselfish man—who lives and gives—drinks deep and is satisfied.

Ella prayed a futile little prayer wisht it was a prettier doll. I wisht—" It was with a sigh that the man turned away from the high shelf. Perhaps he was thinking that warm clothes cost a great deal—that even food for little daughters is something hard to manage. And as for beautiful dolls. . . .

There was a scuffle on the stairs, and the door swung open, and a little girl clattered in—a little girl with frost-bitten hands and great, hungry eyes. She flung herself into the man's ready arms.

"Oh, daddy," she told him, "I seen th' most beautiful doll terday—"

The man patted her hair with tender, reddened fingers, but he didn't look very happy. "It's a shame," he was telling himself, "that it couldn't be a better one—" And then he said half aloud—

The President's Mission

PRESIDENT WILSON has gone to France on a great mission, as the representative of this nation. At the urgent appeal of the Allies, he has put aside all personal considerations in order that he may the better succeed in bringing to a satisfactory close the work America set out to do when it entered the war. With quiet dignity and conclusive logic, he has stated in his address to Congress his reasons for undertaking the journey. It is true, some have caviled at his going and questioned the soundness of the policy which called the executive away from the seat of government. There are many, however, who will regard these objections as being really a tribute to the President. If his presence be so desirable here at this time, how much more so will it be for him to be present in that chamber at Versailles, where the peace of the world hangs in the balance, awaiting his interpretation of America's terms, to which the assembled powers are expected to give united assent!

This is the central thought in his message to the Congress. He explained that the Allied governments, as well as the Central Powers, had accepted our peace bases, and that the Allies "very reasonably desire my personal counsel in their interpretation and application." He was certainly justified, in view of the magnitude of the occasion and of all the national interests involved, in adding: "I know of no business or interest which should take precedence of them (the peace settlements). . . . I owe it to them to see to it, so far as in me lies, that no false or mistaken interpretation is put upon them and no possible effort omitted to realize them."

Our sons offered their life blood to obtain these results. Shall we wonder then that the President should now declare, "I can think of no call to service which could transcend this?"

President Wilson has bared his heart to the nation in unconventional phrase on this occasion. In view of his frankness, his intense desire that not only America but the friends of liberty throughout the world should reap the largest fruits of victory, and his appreciation of the high ideal America has followed throughout the war, it would be regrettable and even inconceivable if the cordial sympathy and support he asks for his present course should be denied.

To him the summons of the nations is simply a call in which he can hear the voice of America added to the voices of the Allies; for it is a duty the faithful performance of which is as important to our own land and our own people as to any other on earth. We have fought and suffered for these ideals, to maintain which in all their fulness he has not hesitated to set aside traditional usage. He carries with him the best wishes of the entire nation for a safe and prosperous voyage, a happy consummation to his plans and a speedy return.

The Crime Against Childhood

WE HAVE not yet set the seal of our national disapproval upon the crime against childhood—the least forgivable crime of all.

Reports compiled by the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor show a pronounced increase in child employment, as well as a general lengthening of hours of work, since the Federal Child Labor Law was declared unconstitutional in June of this year.

In twenty-four states in which the eight-hour day is not required by law for children between fourteen and sixteen years of age a general return to the long working-day of nine, ten and even eleven hours has been reported.

Investigations made since June 3, the date the law was declared unconstitutional, show 909 children under fourteen years at work in 392 factories, 3,189 under sixteen years working more than eight hours a day and 149 working at night. In thirteen mines inspected, 62 children under sixteen years of age were found at work.

It is to our credit that we have made it a crime to overwork a horse, but it is to our shame that it is not yet a crime to overwork a child.

In the Senate Finance Committee's revision of the Kitchen taxation bill there has been inserted a provision imposing a special tax of ten per cent. upon the output of any mine and quarry employing children under sixteen years, and upon the product of any mill, cannery, workshop and factory employing children under fourteen years, or children from fourteen to sixteen for more than eight hours a day or six days a week, or before 6 A.M. or after 7 P.M.

This is an indirect method of abolishing child labor, adopted instead of the direct method which the United States Supreme Court has vetoed. Taking the ground that the taxing power of the nation is unquestioned, the framers of this feature of the bill intend to apply that power to discourage the crime against childhood.

Church Unity Marches On

IN THE year which has elapsed since the matter of a thorough realignment of the Christian forces of America was discussed by a notable inter-denominational assemblage at Pittsburg, the discussion has taken a nation-wide range. Many men eminent in the religious world—professors, bishops, influential pastors and clear-sighted laymen—have taken up the theme of the Conference, and are now urging concerted action looking to a united religious front in which all the denominations may stand together. This plan is spreading in lands across the sea, and the remarkable letter from the English author, Sir Hall Caine, which we publish today, demonstrates how the Unity idea is dominating the thoughts of men as nothing has done to an equal extent since the Reformation.

One of the most notable proofs of the widespread interest in the new movement is found in the recent gathering in Philadelphia of prominent ministers and laymen from various states, representing fourteen denominations, including Presbyterians, Reformed Church, Methodists, Protestant Episcopal, Moravians, and others, for the purpose of conferring on Church unity as a fundamental need, and to endeavor to bring about close co-operation in the fields of home and foreign missions. It was explained that while these leaders had no formal plans to present, they were willing to go the whole way with each other in co-operation for the attainment of the common objective.

Among the leading churchmen to advocate unity is Roy B. Guild, D.D. In very practical terms he brings home the parallel between the material and spiritual aspects of the case. Speaking for the churches, he says:

"We have gone on talking of the eastern front (Methodist), and western front (Baptist), and the Italian front (Presbyterian), and the Salonicia front (Episcopalian), and the Egyptian front (Lutheran), and the Mesopotamian front (Congregational), forgetting that there is but one front (the Kingdom of God) with many flanks; that with these colossal armies (churches) the battlefield is continental. The world knows how 'combined thought and action' was brought about in the war. The plan of the Allies has become the plan of the churches of many cities. Not by obliteration of denominational lines but by strengthening all the forces within these lines, and reinforcing them by sane and consistent co-ordination. The churches in cities like Pittsburg, Indianapolis, St. Louis, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Toledo, Duluth, have allied their forces and elected captains to make the unity real. Twenty-five cities now employ executive secretaries for the directing of the interchurch work, and a score more of cities are today more seriously considering doing this than ever before. Victory won by Unity in these cities is the incontrovertible argument why such Unity should become a reality in every city in America. This is the kind of democratic Unity of Christian democracy immediately possible and absolutely necessary to the fullest success of the Christian churches."

Dr. Guild's excellent illustration deserves to be seriously considered by the various bodies which are now debating whether to take the step that leads to unity or to wander on in disunion. The churches ought to be at the center of things in all that relates to human effort for the world's betterment. Every denomination has all-important work ahead of it on these lines. We have combinations in industry, in finance, in municipal and rural development, and in every kind of business. Why should the Church of Christ, which is charged with the high mission of looking after the eternal welfare of men, be divided when union of forces would give her strength and victory?

The Homecoming of Our Boys

IT WAS thrilling news that 850,000 of our soldier and sailor boys would be home for Christmas. They are coming daily by shiploads of thousands. Never before in history did fleets carry such cargoes of pride and happiness.

To the mothers, wives and little ones and to sweethearts and friends it has been a time of unspeakable, heart-straining suspense—but, ah! the swift and sweet reaction to exquisite joy at the news that their boys are hurrying home!

They are coming with the glory of victory in a righteous cause, but not all the glory is theirs. Heroic as was their fighting over there, no less heroic has been the waiting here. The glad cheers ringing out from the transports that bear the boys into the home harbors tell that the joy of the homecoming is not all on the side of those waiting to welcome them. The boys are happy in the homecoming at this particularly appropriate time.

All over our land, every year, Christmas brings back to the old home the children and the children's children, once more to set our lips to the spring of love that is pure and undefiled. Whether we turn back to it from glory and successes, or from failures and sorrows, the home is ever a sanctuary of virtues and the sweetest earthly interpretation of heaven.

Some of our boys who went bravely abroad are not coming back home. They are gone to a better home. Tears for our loss must well up through praise of their valor and pride in their noble sacrifice. To many a home a glory has come that is not of earth.

Edmond Rostand

THE passing of Edmond Rostand removes one of the outstanding poet-dramatists of our time.

Rostand had the peculiar depth of human sympathy and understanding which enabled him to grasp the spirit and the heart-throbs of great events, clothe them in deathless language and send them forth into the world in flesh and blood. It is seldom that a man has more than one masterpiece, but Rostand is well known to Americans by three, "Cyrano de Bergerac," "L'Aiglon" and "Chantecler," all brilliant with spirit and vibrant with life. Rostand was a protest against the conventional drama of France. To a theater too much dominated by stage and literary carpenters he brought the deep inspiration and the rousing force of new ideals and an intimate touch with the real abiding forces of life.

To Bring the Ex-Kaiser to Trial

COUNT WILHELM HOHENZOLLERN will prove something of an enigma to future historians. Amid the long record of fallen royalties, it would be difficult to find a single uncrowned monarch who has presented a figure so utterly abject and pusillanimous as that of the ex-Kaiser. Repudiated by the German people, who have demanded his arrest and trial for treason, he has hugged his lonely exile in Holland, varying the monotony by weak attempts at exculpation and with occasional spasms of religious fervor. His efforts to shift to other shoulders the responsibility for his criminal war have made little impression, however, either in Germany or among the Allies.

Prince Lieknowsky and Dr. Mühlon, who were driven out of the homeland because they had told the truth about the responsibility for the war, may yet have an opportunity to give their testimony unhindered before a competent tribunal. England is now said to be urging the Dutch authorities to surrender the Kaiser in order that he may stand trial, and the other Allies are understood to be agreeable to a criminal procedure. Justice could not be satisfied and the historic record would not be complete without the full story of the Potsdam Conference being given to the world; nor is Germany likely to oppose this, although the exposure will doubtless fix the responsibility for the world-struggle upon the Kaiser as the original plotter and prime promoter.

A new sensational touch has been given to the situation by the disclosure of a plot to restore the Hohenzollern monarchy, which was fortunately nipped in the bud. One of Chancellor Ebert's agents tapped a wire, which led to the discovery that a counter-revolution was in progress. Field Marshal von Mackensen, General von Arnim, and several other Prussian militarists are indicated as the leaders in this latest conspiracy. Von Mackensen's army was prepared to march on Berlin, imprison the members of the present government, set up a provisional régime and open the way for the return of the ex-Kaiser. Discovery of the plot seems to have been almost simultaneous with the internment of Von Mackensen's troops in Hungary. He had planned to bring Wilhelm back to Berlin in triumph at a time when the capital would be filled with troops coming home from the great retreat. Von Hindenburg alone of the former Prussian leaders refused to join the reactionaries, and stood by the new government. Doubtless the news of the proposed restoration has added determination to the desire of the Allies to bring the ex-Kaiser to the bar of justice. Germany has plainly come to the conclusion that it is well rid of him and would prefer to remain so.

"Kaiser or Christ?" Says Sir Hall Caine

The Famous British Author Urges a League of the Churches for the Protection of the World's Faith

Sir Hall Caine

IN THE following remarkable letter Sir Hall Caine, whom many place at the head of living English authors, discusses the attitude and opportunity of the Christian Church from a new viewpoint. Germany's "Religion of Valor," he declares, was the real question the war had to answer. It was Kaiser or Christ. Now, we are to have a League of Nations for the World's Peace, and we need also a League of Churches for the preservation of the World's Faith. He suggests a program by which this end may be reached. This he declares is "the only true, possible Reformation."

GREEBA CASTLE, ISLE OF MAN.

October 25, 1918.

Editor of the Christian Herald, New York.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of September 5 asks me a difficult question, and I am so deeply immersed in such public work as I am able to do that it is only possible for me to give a brief and perhaps not fully considered reply.

You tell me that a writer in Scribner's Magazine says that distinctions of faith have largely disappeared among American soldiers in the army, and that "Baptists chum daily with Congregationalists, and both with Episcopopians." Good gracious, why shouldn't they? Confronted by the only true realities, life and death and the hereafter, what on earth are the differences of church government, or even of Biblical interpretation, which separate men in times of peace?

The one living fact we have got to count with us is that this war is in itself a struggle between the forces of faith and the forces of unbelief. For forty years Germany, while attempting to establish a world-empire, has also been trying to establish a new world-religion. As opposed to the religion of the Founder of our Faith, the new German religion was what Germany called "the religion of valor." The pagan religion was at war with every hope and aspiration of Christianity. "You have heard," said one of the modern German philosophers, "how it was said in old time, 'Blessed are the peacemakers'; but I say to you, 'Blessed are the warmakers.'" Thus it came to pass that at the beginning of the twentieth century in Europe two spirit forces were contending for man's allegiance. Berlin or Nazareth, the Kaiser or Christ—which was it to be?

That was the real question the war had to answer, and all other questions (such as the integrity of Belgium) were merely secondary to it. Therefore when your American soldiers reached the battlefields in France, that was the question they had to settle, whether they were fully or only partly conscious of it. And face to face with that great issue, what did it matter whether a man believed that adult baptism by immersion or infant baptism by sprinkling was the order ordained by the Mother Church of Christendom? All such questions sank into the insignificance they deserved, and nothing remained to the men who had to share the same dangers but the high spiritual comradeship of the joint-heirs of the same faith, who were there to fight and die for it.

As to their relations in the future, none of us can speak with certainty. • It is possible that in days of peace we may sink back to the condition in which denominational distinctions will seem to be paramount. I do not think we will. Men who have seen such distinctions die away in the near presence of death are not likely to be too patient of them in the fulness of life. They know their value, and how little worth they are when the great moments come. Therefore the churches must be prepared to find that to vast numbers of their American soldiers out of the furnace of war the barriers dividing them will seem to be no better than dust and ashes.

How the churches should act in the light of that possibility is a difficult question. The divisions have not been wholly injurious. If they have fostered rivalry, they have stimulated zeal. Remove the one and you may diminish the other. My view as a layman would be that no attempt should be made to abolish the sovereignty of each church within itself. You couldn't abolish it in all the churches, for the Roman Catholic Church and the Jewish Church would always refuse to unite with the other churches.

On the whole my view of the future of the churches is the same as my view of the future of the nations. We want a League of Nations for the protection of the world's peace, and we want a League of the Churches for the protection of the world's faith. But let us not ask too much lest we end by getting nothing. Let us leave each church sovereign within itself, and sole authority on questions of dogma, but let us call for a universal council of all the churches to meet yearly in one or other of the great cities, and at intervals of, say, ten years in one or other of the great countries, to fight the host of evils which constantly arise, and to aid the League of Nations in preserving the world's peace by uplifting the standard of the general conscience of mankind. That will be the true and perhaps the only possible Reformation.

Yours truly,
[Signed] HALL CAINE.

A Minnesota Pastor on the Church's Future

IN THESE days of great events we expect great things. There are a great many people who rejoice because of the hopeful signs of a greater unity among the Christians of America. This is just the time when our land is ready for a great advance toward this end. It seems therefore that we should do something more definite than just talk and write about these things.

The need of this unity is so great that nothing need be said about that. Public sentiment everywhere is ready for some big move on the part of the leaders of our denominations. We all want it, but how is it to be brought about? That is the big question.

There is a universal law that tells us that the best way to get rid of something old and inferior is to substitute something better in its place. This is taking place in the world round about us every day. There's no use trying to counteract the laws of God. If we can only find a great and good model for a church that will meet the needs of our age, we shall have no trouble to get away from our little denominational differences. We shall have no trouble finding such a model if we look for one. We have not been looking for such an ideal.

Let me, in all humbleness, describe the fundamental principles of such a church. First of all it must be a Christian church. The Spirit of Jesus must must be American in principles and practice. We must have a church "of the people and for the people." The voice of the people must govern. We are seeking to banish from the world systems that say that some men should dictate and others should obey. Wherever a person is told "thus saith the church," and you may believe that and need not bother yourself about anything else," and that person ceases to think for himself on religious questions, he ceases to grow, along that line at least. For such reasons there are many minds that are well developed along other lines, but are stunted and dwarfed religiously.

permeate and inspire this church. If we cannot have a Christian church we may as well not have a church at all. Jesus Christ must be preached from the pulpit, for he is the Saviour of the world. Then this church

If Every Day Were Christmas

TEXT—Romans 14:5. "One man esteemeth one day above another; another man esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully assured in his own mind."

THE fourteenth chapter of Romans is a rare piece of writing. In it the apostle pleads for sympathy and toleration, and these without compromise of faith. In the fifth verse there is an interesting allusion to the keeping of special days. The Jewish religion has many special seasons and celebrations; likewise, the church calendar contains notable days and anniversaries. Yet withal, a cardinal principle in Christianity is that salvation does not depend upon the observance of special days or seasons. That is to say, there is no particular efficacy in the keeping of days, though their wise use may be and frequently is helpful. Now there were some in the early Church who esteemed every day alike. There were others who attached importance to special days. The apostle takes a broad and tolerant view of the matter: "Let each man," he wrote, "be fully assured in his own mind."

This text revives the memory of a camp-meeting song of my boyhood days. It was the first camp meeting I every attended, and the preachers and singers were negroes. There was a great deal of excitement, much eloquent preaching and the singing was full of fervor. There was one song that was particularly popular, the chorus of which ran, "Every day'll be Sunday by-and-by." The tune impressed me more at the time than the sentiment, although I think I understood the sentiment to mean that if every day were Sunday, there would be constant singing, continual worship in the churches and very little if any of the ordinary round of daily toil. Underneath the literalism of such words is, of course, the idea of a recognition of God seven days in the week, and that is altogether commendable.

What if every day were Christmas? The suggestion at first blush is perhaps not altogether agreeable. One can imagine numerous protests against the idea because of the excesses to which many go on Christmas holidays. There are tired mothers to whom the season means extra household duties; heavily burdened fathers whose financial resources are often strained to meet the new demands; salesmen and saleswomen worn by the more exacting rush of the Christmas trade; drivers of delivery wagons, the postmen almost buried beneath their load of packages. At first perhaps all save the children would regard with disfavor the very suggestion of Christmas coming every day. Let it be granted freely that Christmas is misused, that it is often a season of excesses and extremes; even so, who of us would do away with Christmas? For despite all the excesses of the holiday season and the hardship it works on many, is there not a rainbow of glory over every Christmas celebration?

CHRISTMAS is a season of prophetic idealism and a rebuke to selfish living. At the approach of the anniversary of our Lord's birth, men and women whose thoughts have been mostly of self are moved to think of others. The idea of serving others and making others happy affects even the blasé and the indifferent. Somehow, the idea that it is more blessed to give than to bargain finds lodgment in minds unused to tender and benevolent thoughts. For a brief period, cruel competitions that so sorely grind human society are lessened if not forgotten. For the time being, all humanity seems to be one family. There is a delight in seeing everybody joyous. The foreigner is made to feel at home. Artificial barriers are broken, and there come even into hard faces some softened lines. The spirit of Christmas penetrates even behind stone walls, and the prisoner is made to know that he is still remembered and that society has not abandoned hope in him.

Christmas is the one season of the year when we are especially reminded to take Jesus seriously. The Sermon on the Mount seems practicable then—the Beatitudes possible in daily life. Even the great words, "Peace on earth, good will toward men," actually appears workable at Christmastide. The old text so precious, so peculiarly appropriate, John 3:16, finds lodgment in our heart of hearts: "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life." There comes into our minds the conviction that we have not taken seriously the lessons that our Lord taught, but that now we take him at his word: we share, we give, we sacrifice, we find a new joy growing out of these very practical and beautiful ministrations.

CHRISTMAS centers our thoughts and affections on the child. The cradle and Christmas are forever associated. God himself joined them together. Man cannot, even if he so desires, quite tear them asunder. Christmas to the child is haloed with glory. There lingers in my memory like the music of some melodious chimes the remark of my own little son. The little fellow was in bed but wide awake and alert. We were talking about many things, when he introduced the subject that was upon his mind with the remark, "Oh, I wish I could go to sleep and not wake up until Christmas day!" How very much the Christmas season means to a little child!

Christmas helps us to remember not only the Christ-child, but also what Christ said about all little children, and especially the words, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not." With the return of Christmas men and women who have forgotten the child remember him again. Ministries of tenderness to little children come on the Christmas anniversary that might not otherwise come at all. Inequalities, injustice, the sting of poverty, the blight put upon babyhood by wrongs long endured wherein the rights of the child have been forgotten—at Christmas time the child is exalted in the minds of millions.

Christmas exalts the home and glorifies the family life. It helps to make strong the ties of kinship and to impress on the mind of childhood the mystic memories of the season of holly, mistletoe and gift-laden evergreen trees. Christmas away from home is not much Christmas at all. It needs mother and father or little children or family groups to transfigure and glorify the Christmas. Christmas in trenches and in camp is made endurable only as the home is represented by letters and gifts that are sent from hearts that yearn for the absent loved ones.

The real Christmas spirit is the taking of Jesus' teachings seriously, the protest against selfishness, the centering of our thoughts and affections on the child, the exaltation of family life, the spirit of goodwill toward men. Such is the essence of Christmas. And why not this spirit every day? Is it not because we have confined our Christianity to special days, and forgotten or ignored the high levels of spiritual living on other days?

IT IS not in the purposes of the Almighty that God should be remembered one day in the week and forgotten six days; or that by keeping his commandments on Sunday one might ignore them on Monday. It is a travesty on the spirit of Christmas to lavish our gifts at the holiday time, and be meager of love and miserly of all those graces of heart and mind the rest of the year. To acknowledge all men as our brothers once a year and to regard them as aliens three hundred and sixty-four days is a form of infidelity peculiarly opprobrious. To put the child in the midst at Christmas, acknowledge his precedence, only to cast him out and deny and defy his rights the rest of the year, is basely cruel.

If the spirit of Christmas were with us every day, O followers of the Christ, some revolutionary events would occur.

Selfishness would die a death of starvation. Avarice would be hung higher than Haman. Foolish pride would go down in crushing defeat. Senseless strife and silly bickerings would shame each other to death.

The prayer of Jesus for the unity of his followers would be answered.

Racial animosities would be drowned in a sea of brotherhood.

War, with all its horrors, its brutality, its devilishness, would be an utter impossibility.

"Peace on earth" would become a glorious reality.

SOMEWHERE I remember reading of a strange Christmas gift once received by a young woman. The young woman had expected some valuable present. She had set her heart on a piece of jewelry which she had reason to believe would be given to her by a very dear friend, a charming woman, the hospitality of whose home she had often enjoyed and highly prized. But when Christmas day dawned and the young woman opened the gift from this friend it turned out to be just an ordinary doorkey, tied with a piece of ribbon on which was a little card. The young woman was at first so disappointed that she did not even read the inscription on the card; but when she did, this is what she saw: "The key to the door of the house of a friend. It is yours to use. Use it every day if you wish." The lovely significance of the gift then broke fully upon the young woman: that lovely home with the special guest chamber in which she had on several occasions rested in peace and comfort—this home open whenever she minded to use the key!

Oh, beautiful symbol. To let the Great Guest into our hearts but once a week or once a year is not often enough. Give him the key—the key of loyalty and love! Let him in—let him in to stay. "I will come and sup with thee and thou with me," said Jesus. Let the blessed Saviour into your life, and the spirit of Christmas will abide forever and ever.

FOUR years of heroic struggle, from which she has come stronger, more glorious, triumphant, has turned the eyes of the world to France, our friend and ally. The presence on her sacred soil of more than 2,000,000 of the sons of American homes has centered there the thoughts, the love and the interest of the American people. But neither the eyes of France nor the eyes of America look backward. With losses enshrined in the hearts of those who have suffered most, France turns her face to the new day, the day of new things, of new achievement, of rebuilding, of renewed and reinvigorated and widened life. And America likewise, holding herself ready to help at every point, looks toward the sunrise as she prepares to recall from the scenes of their recent triumph the sons of whom God did not require the full sacrifice which they offered.

But all of this makes the capital of France a throbbing center of the world's life. There indeed will Christmas be the day of days of all the years and of all the world. Christmas this year will be such a Christmas as the world has not known for five long years. Four times the anniversary of the birth of Christ has been shadowed by the conflicts of men, and now the Manger Cradle of Christ receives again the homage of a world once more ready to acclaim him Prince of Peace, more than ever ready to receive the revelation of which his birth was the beginning.

But Christmas in Paris will this year set the pace for Christmas the world over. Who of us would not gladly share this wonderful Christmas in that once gay capital? Four years of sorrow have brought out the strong and enduring faith once unsuspected beneath the mask of gaiety, and one of us will share that Christmas day in France, one well beloved by all the Christian Herald Family. Do you ask who? If we should answer that would be telling. But next week in the Christmas issue this one sharing in the Christmas overseas will tell us in a personal message the things to be seen, the joys planned to be shared, the ideals to be achieved in this visit at Christmastide to the capital of undefeated France. Through this message around our hearthstone the Christian Herald Family will see with its own eyes the France of victory; will learn intimate details of the relief which the money of the Christian Herald Family has made possible; will get a new vision of the soul of the army "Over There," and will span the three thousand miles of ocean with its love and interest. Watch for the announcement in next week's paper. You may have as many guesses as you like as to who is going. Next week you will know; but as you read this a swift French liner is carrying our messenger to Paris over seas no longer burdened with the lurking terror of the torpedoes, through sun-kissed waves which hide no terrible catastrophe. The world is free again this Christmastide, and in the spirit of him who made it free our messenger goes "Over There," to put into a series of stories which will begin, with the New Year, the intimate, personal holy things which Christmas and the new day of peace have meant to France and to the world.

Love makes the homeliest face winsome, the simplest words powerful, the humblest life successful.

What a hopeless jumble this old world would be if we made as many mistakes as the other fellow!

Nèver try to run your religious life by feeling alone—you may run out of fuel.

The Peace of the Larger Life

SUNDAY, December 22. Matt. 11:29. "Ye shall find rest unto your souls." Christ's call is always a call to a larger life. It may not be a call to a larger field, but it is always a call to a larger life which is independent of the size of its sphere. He calls us from small interests to universal interests. He calls us from imprisoning narrowness to the freedom of a saving magnanimity. In the realm of the Spirit all enlargement means the enrichment of our securities. In rising into the rare air of Alpine heights we leave behind the germs and microbes which despoilate the plains below. The sanatorium is always in the mountains. And in accepting the call of Christ to the larger life, we are lifted above the enemies which infest the smaller life. The very bigness of our new communion makes us insensible to their threats and allurements, and we discover that many of the struggles and irritations of our previous life are ended. The drop of vinegar which adds a tang of bitterness to a cup of water is entirely lost when it is dropped in a lake. We escape a horde of small miseries by just becoming bigger men.

And therefore it is very true that there are many fretful and much-troubled people whose burden would be immediately lightened if they would take an additional load by sharing the burdens of others. That is the miracle which has been accomplished in countless numbers during the last four years. The war has opened many prison doors. It has broken down the walls of a coddling selfishness in many a life, and it has led the astonished spirit into treasures of undreamed-of freedom. It is not that the old irritabilities have been vanquished. They have simply been left behind. They have dropped away like old leaves which fall from the trees as the driving force of a new sap rises in their hearts in the early days of the spring. "Old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new." They have taken their places on God's great highway, and they have begun to live. J. H. J.

How to Be Rich

MONDAY, December 23. I Tim. 6:17, 18. "Charge them that are rich in this world . . . that they do good." The briefest biography of Jesus is the single sentence, "He went about doing good." It is at once his briefest and his best biography. No more eloquent eulogy could be pronounced. He might have gone about getting good, that is, acquiring virtue. He might have gone about being good, that is, exhibiting his goodness. He might have gone about getting goods, that is, accumulating property. He did none of these things. He was rich only in good works. His goodness was both passive and active. It was positive, even aggressive. He sought daily, hourly opportunity to do good. If the eternal God had come to earth to dwell, how better could he have proved his deity? We believe that in Jesus Christ God did reveal his own humanness.

Jesus of Nazareth was among the poorest of men. So far as we know he never owned an inch of ground, never held a mortgage, never possessed a jewel, never, after he left his mother's dwelling-place, had a home to call his own. Yet he was the richest of men, and in his wealth of goodness the world is rich in hope and love. "As poor, yet making many rich." And the poorest of us may be rich as he was. The Irish woman in New Orleans who baked bread for the poor; the old fruit-seller in London who adopted waifs of the street as her own, took care of them during their childhood and sent them to Canada or Australia when they grew up; the friend of newboys in Brooklyn so recently gone to his coronation; the "angel of the Tombs," a woman in whom every outcast had a friend—these are they who point the way by which we who are rich in this world may also be rich in the world to come. "We brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out," but it is certain we can send ahead of us much that shall add to our wealth in the eternal world. It is not enough for us to be good. It must be one of the passions of our lives to do good after the methods and in the spirit of the Master.

Simeon's Faith

TUESDAY, December 24. Luke 2:29, 30. "Now, O Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." Simeon had not seen anything but a little Baby in its mother's arms, yet the same Spirit that told him he should not see death till he had seen the Lord Christ revealed the Child Jesus unto him in the temple as the coming Saviour of men. Simeon knew nothing of the wonderful words and works of Jesus that would occur during his life, nothing of the spread of Christianity during the coming centuries. But he realized that the fulness of time had come, and that God had sent forth his Son in the flesh, for whom the world had waited during four millenniums. What prophets had longed to behold, his gladdened eyes now saw. His faith covered the victorious march of the Son of God through all coming time. He believed God, seeing the triumph from afar. He saw the Light to lighten the Gentiles and to be the glory of his people Israel. No wonder he exclaimed with indescribable ecstasy, "Now, Lord, let me go where I may help celebrate the salvation of the world in thy nearer presence, among saints and angels!"

Faith is a vision that sees the end from the beginning. It is unlimited as God. By the revealing power of the Holy Spirit, as well as of Christ's own word, Jesus' second coming has been portrayed to the minds of the writers of the New Testament. Though a day with the Lord is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day, the apostles believed that he would come again quickly, and exclaimed, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus!" In only a few days of those thousand years each he will be here to reign. What visions John had of Christ's glorious coming on the lonely isle of Patmos; how perfectly he painted them for mankind in the Book of Revelation! He could pray as Simeon did and go home, to return with his Lord, in the establishment of His everlasting kingdom. Jesus revealed himself to Paul, and told him about his future appearing and glorious triumphs, and he told all the ages. Oh that our dull eyes might be opened, like those of Elisha's young man, to see the vision of the coming Christ, escorted by his heavenly host, to meet his victorious saints on earth and unite all in his one glorious Kingdom!

The Lowly Birth

WEDNESDAY, December 25. Luke 2:11. "Unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." The angel who made this announcement to the shepherds had declared it to be "good tidings of great joy to all people." If the Roman emperor in whose reign Christ was born had had a son born to him, the announcement of the event might not have caused great rejoicing among his subjects; for the birth of a new prince would simply have meant continued service and toil for them. But this child is come to serve, and to lay down his life for his people, not to be served or to take lives.

The heavenly messenger is very particular in his directions to the shepherds how to find the Saviour. "This shall be a sign unto you: Ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger." If his aim had been to seek his ease and to exact service from men, he would not have entered life in such a lowly manner. He would have been born in some marble palace, he would have been placed in a golden cradle, and the peers of the nation would have surrounded him. This child makes such a humble and unpropitious beginning of life, because he comes to fulfil the purposes of that divine mercy which seeks to save fallen man.

Nevertheless, out of his present lowly condition he is pressing forward to an exceeding great glory, to which he desires to lift such lowly people as the shepherds who have come to pay homage to him in his uncouth surroundings. For over the dark and squalid stable resounds through heaven's wide-arching vault a new song of praise, the everlasting Christmas anthem which God has composed and which God's singers and harpers around the glassy sea are rendering: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." That means: World, we congratulate thee upon the receipt of this Christmas Gift from thy Father in heaven. He shall spread the glory of God's righteousness and grace throughout thy lands. He shall put a stop to thy wars and strifes. He shall knit thy children in love to one another, and put the gladness of faith in their hearts.

Go Forward!

THURSDAY, December 26. Ex. 14:15. "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward." No word of admonition is oftener heard during the great war than this: "Carry on!" It has become an almost universal watchword among the English-speaking Allies. A gifted Englishwoman, left a widow with three children, has lost two of her dear ones, and writes to an American friend, "But we must go on!"

The command, "Go forward!" is of the very essence of victory. This is true in life as in war. "Faint, yet pursuing," is the apostolic resolution. Unnumbered foes may surround us. Siren voices may sing their song of dalliance. Our native inertia may dispose us to cease effort. But the prize is still before us, and so long as earth tempts us or eternity beckons with its perfect hope, our only safety is to keep our loins girded and go forward, however laboriously, however painfully, making sure that in our progress we leave behind no good that can be taken on with us. In the process of spiritual evolution God allows nothing good in old forms to be forsaken—all that is best is incorporated in the new. The best of Judaism is in Christianity. The best in the Old Testament is confirmed in the New. The best things in our earthly life are to be preserved for us in the life to come—faith and love. "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward."

The Friend of Sinners

FRIDAY, December 27. Luke 15:2. "This man receiveth sinners." This is the Pharisees' taunt at the merciful ministry of Jesus. What would they have done with sinners? They would have cast them out from their holy society and prided themselves on that as a most worthy action. There is nothing so cruel as man's inhumanity to man. Many a sinner has been driven to final despair by the scorn and contempt which his brethren heaped upon him. Now, what would-be righteous men sneer at is the very essence of the Gospel. It is this message that Jesus receives sinners that has lifted many a wretch out of his misery and made him a new man. Every humble soul that has come repentant to the Friend of sinners remembers to the end of his life the solace that came into his heart when he heard these words: There is a place for you at Jesus' side. He is shocked at hearing men speak disdainfully of that mercy which gave him the assurance that his guilt has been removed, which lifted the gloom from his aching conscience and filled his heart with the joy of salvation. We who have cast ourselves on the mercy of Jesus and trust only in his grace think very highly of this opprobrium which was cast on his ministry. Though our sins are red like crimson and numberless as the sands upon the seashore, we know that the mercy of God is greater still. And we are sure that God who spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, will freely give us all other things which are necessary to stay our misery. We rejoice in the condescension at which men who do not realize the bane and terror of an evil conscience mock. We glory in the pity of our heavenly Father who removes our transgressions from us, as far as the east is from the west. We love this divine Friend who does not think himself too good to associate with us, to call us his brethren, and to lend us his all-powerful aid, that after our worthless life we may begin life over again in his companionship and under his guidance.

The Guide Through the Gate

SATURDAY, December 28. Ps. 90:12. "So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom." "The longest day at last bends down to evening." In the morning begins the new year of hope and victory. May we carry no hatred, no evil habit across the threshold of 1919. All enmities should lie in the grave of the buried past. Every tomorrow should be better than yesterday, crowning the soul with pardon and peace. It is thus that sorrow will be turned to praise, gloom to gladness, the false to the true.

One should never neglect or forget the presence of the Unchangeable One who walks with us all the way, leading us over dangerous places and guiding amid the mazes of mystery to his palace home. Continued communion with him can never exhaust the resources of his love, nor reach the limit of his thought, nor measure the beauty of his holiness. Infinity is his dwelling-place; without him there is no being inviting you to an eternal ideal, no face revealing the glory of the Father, no person who can tell you the secret of life, the purpose of the universe, or the way to heart satisfaction amid the unrest and disappointments of time.

He alone can preserve thy going out and thy coming in from this time forth and even forevermore. He is the bread of life for soul hunger, the water of life for thirst. In him we are filled with all the fulness of God.

So, hope-lit New Year, with thy joys uncertain,
Whose unsolved mystery none may foretell,
I calmly trust my God to lift the curtain;
Safe in his love, for me 'twill all be well.

CHAPTER EIGHT

IT was Requa who opened the door. At sight of Dick she turned very pale and without a word started to close the door in Dick's face. But he put his foot against it, came in, shut it and leaned back on it.

"I have just heard the news about your father, Requa, and had to come." Requa looked at him strangely.

"You had to come? Have you read the account in the paper?"

"Yes. Your father is convicted by the government. He has been sentenced. It does not seem possible. Requa, dear, I had to come to comfort you."

"To comfort me?"

"Requa! I have not seen you for days. Not since I was here last. What would you think of me if I should refuse in this great trouble to come to you? Why did you not send for me?"

"Have you read the account in the paper?" Requa asked hysterically.

"Yes. Enough to know your father is sentenced."

"But you have not read all. That is not all. If you had read all, you would not be here, in this house."

"What do you mean, Requa?"

"You have a paper there in your pocket?" Requa pointed a trembling finger at the paper Dick had bought. "Read that before you touch me." Requa drew back as Dick had stepped closer to her.

He drew the paper out of his pocket, and smoothing it out began to read more of the details under the headlines. As he read on, he became so absorbed, so horribly interested in the government narrative, that he forgot where he was, forgot Requa's presence, forgot everything but the expert official statements he was reading, statements that convicted Rufus Randall of crime so great that he wondered, as he read on, what action his father could take when he knew all.

THESE are a few paragraphs which burned into his memory:

"Facts brought out by the government investigation prove that Rufus Randall's mills furnished parts for airplanes, including struts, cotter pins and wing skids. Numbered parts have been traced to defective planes used by our aviators in France. It is conclusively proved by these numbered parts that material furnished by the accused, Rufus Randall, was so defective that the lives of several gallant men were endangered and some were actually lost."

"In reply to request from investigating committee officers of — Aviation Section, Division — of Flying Corps, American Experiment Company No. — we regret to say that the death of Lieutenant Albert Ward was due in part if not wholly to a defective plane, parts of which were issued from Rufus Randall's mill in Bradford, Sept. —. Lieutenant Ward had engaged the enemy, which had attacked him in squadron formation. He had sent one German Albatross down in flames and had attacked another when his machine was seen to crumple up on one of its wings. He was seen by observers to crawl out on the other wing to preserve the balance and maintained this perilous position until his plane was within a hundred feet of the ground on the French side, the enemy retiring under fire from our anti-plane guns."

"At that altitude six of our officers witnessed the sudden collapse of Lieutenant Ward's crippled machine as it fell, and we testify that his death was not caused primarily by wounds inflicted by the enemy, although he was shot in the head and shoulder. But his death, according to our belief, was directly due, beyond question, to the defects in the plane he was flying, parts of which plane by number can be traced to material supplied by Rufus Randall's mills."

"All the more we regret that several gallant heroes like Lieutenant Ward lost their lives on account of American greed and disloyalty. We whose names are affixed solemnly swear that to the best of our belief Lieutenant Ward lost his life owing to defective parts of his plane, parts manufactured and supplied by the firm of Rufus Randall of Bradford."

cially designated, of the officers of Albert's company.)

DICK looked up from the paper and stared over at Requa. During his absorbed reading she had sat down on a couch and her face was buried in a cushion.

"Your father—" Dick had started to say something, he hardly knew what it was himself under the tremendous shock of the revelation in the paper, when Requa raised her head.

"You understand now why I have not asked you to come here since you left me a week ago. Father confided all that to me before it came out in the paper. It is too horrible to believe. He says he did not know all about the details of the construction, that much of it was done by men lacking expert knowledge, and he can prove to the government he was not knowingly guilty. Dick!" Requa rose and cried out, as her lover stood stern and unresponsive. "You do not know how miserable I am on account of all this! I cannot believe that father meant to do wrong—"

"And yet," Dick said, shrinking back from Requa as she had a little while before repelled him, "the result of the defective work that went out of his mill was just the same as if he was personally responsible. Albert might be living today if—"

"But, oh, Dick! I am not to blame. I am not guilty!"

Dick turned swiftly, and the next moment he had held out his arm. Requa came to him like a child who is tired, and the next moment Rufus Randall walked into the room.

During his entire war experience Richard Ward, like thousands of other young Americans, had come to have a loathing of the fearful things the enemy had done to beautiful France. Devastated gardens and orchards and parks, bombed hospitals, tortured women and children, ruined cathedrals, blotted-out landscapes—the whole thing sank like a blistering memory on his heart. And yet all through he had honestly tried to keep from hating.

AND now the sight of Rufus Randall affected Richard Ward along the line of least resistance, and he was tortured in soul over his loathing of what this man had permitted through his greed for profits and his resistance to the feeling of personal antagonism he had for him.

Randall stared at him as if not sure of his presence.

"What are you doing here?" he asked, speaking slowly.

"I came to comfort Requa for this," Dick said, looking at the paper his hand still held.

"Lies! I can prove my innocence to the government! Do you think I would purposely—"

"I am not here to judge you!" Dick cried suddenly. And then he looked at Requa. She had fainted. He carried her over to the couch and laid her down. Randall went out into the hall and called a servant, and Dick waited only a few moments of embarrassing uneasiness on Requa's account.

When he went out into the hall, Randall followed him. Dick noted now, as he had not at first, the look on Randall's face betraying the burden he was carrying.

"Tell your father I would like to see him, will you?" Randall spoke with difficulty.

"Tell him yourself."

"And I will!" Randall flared up with a white heat of sudden passion. He had picked up the copy of the Journal which Dick had dropped when Requa fainted, and he now tore it apart with his big hands and stepped on the pieces as he followed Dick to the door.

Dick did not even turn around as he went out. It seemed to him he would choke if he tried to speak. He heard the door shut heavily behind him and went on down the walk.

As he came out to the street three or four men in the group still standing across the way came over to ask him about Randall.

"How is he taking it?" Bert Chandler's father was one of the men who asked. Dick answered in general terms.

"Hanging is too good for him," another man said.

A group formed about Dick as he tried to move along. He was annoyed and angered by the interruption at a time when he was excited over his own feeling.

"When will the government arrest Randall?" asked one.

"He will give more bail and keep out of jail all right," said another.

DICK managed finally to escape and start for home. He dreaded the meeting with his father, and he could not help wondering what the result of the meeting would be if Randall and his father should come together.

But he had forgotten momentarily one thing among a multitude that the war had done for the folks at home.

For months the people in America had been living daily, almost hourly, in the atmosphere of great events. Shock had succeeded shock. Sensations had become commonplace. Death and destruction were everyday occurrences. People's hearts and minds were not capable of responding to all these events in proportion to their magnitude. There were too many of them. And there is a merciful limit to what the heart can endure or the mind entertain.

So Dick, if he had better understood all this, might have been prepared for the sight of his father calmly going over the newspaper details of Randall's case as the government commission had given it out to the public. The evidence against Randall was so overwhelming and so conclusive that any possibility of a mistake was out of the question. Randall was simply whistling in the dark when he said he could prove his innocence. For days he had been living a death in life. The fear that had gripped him had forced a confession from him with Requa, a week before the final result was made public.

All this John Ward must have grasped as he read the account given out sensationally that evening. He sat in his study confronting Dick, who had come in somewhat nervously.

"You know all about it, Dad!"

"Yes, Dick. It's dreadful. But it's no more dreadful than a hundred other things we have had to bear during these past years. And do you know, I find myself thinking almost more of what is going to happen to Randall and Requa than of any effect on ourselves."

Something like a wave of relief swept over Dick.

"Oh, Dad! You can think of Requa, even now, can't you? She is not to blame. She is not to blame!"

"No, lad, she is not to blame. But the innocent always suffer with the guilty. Only in a different way."

"And Mr. Randall said he was going to see you. Will they let him? Will you see him?"

"He will not be formally apprehended before tomorrow. And he will be free to come any time before then. Yes, I will see him. But Requa—you cannot press the point of her going with you now?"

"No, Dad," Dick said slowly. "Her father has a claim. I don't deny that."

"And is your own purpose unchanged? Even if finally Requa should make her choice to stay, will you go?"

It was a direct question, a characteristic Ward point-blank question from father to son, and Dick, although used to that sort of frankness ever since he was a child, shrank a little and hesitated before he answered.

"Yes, I will go. Even if I have to go alone. But oh, Dad, after all these years, without home and love and—"

Dick broke down and his father comforted him as he used to do when Dick was a little boy. But it was the greatest proof he could have of the entire consecration of Dick to his call, that it sounded louder to him than even his natural craving for all that Requa had meant to him. It startled Dr. Ward tremendously. After Dick had gone up to his own room his father dropped the paper which contained the dramatic account of Albert's death, and, as if that incident had affected him only for a moment, he let his mind dwell on the living fact of his younger son's consecration to an ideal that measured far more than any earthly ambition for pleasure or personal happiness. How great must have been the world's need of help that Dick had seen on the shattering battle lines of France and Palestine! What momentous pressure must lie on his heart now to go into all the world and do his part as he had already gone once! The marvel grew as Dr. Ward dwelt upon the astonishing fact, a fact that outweighed at every angle the particular and detailed way in which Albert had met his death on the field of the world's honor.

The week that followed Rufus Randall's tragedy was full of events that made fast and important history. On the technicality allowed him he secured further bail pending final decision. Owing to the government's determination to proceed deliberately with this special case, which was attracting widespread attention, no immediate return was handed down. The Bradford citizens were divided in sentiment owing to Randall's long standing as a philanthropist, but the great majority were clamoring for his imprisonment. And still he did not fulfil his threat made to Dick, and come to see Dr. Ward.

And the days sped by to another Sunday filled with the Spirit's power even more than on the days which had already been marked. Even Dr. Ward, with all his optimism and faith in what had already been manifest, was moved to the depths of that day's results. News, which every one had received, of the open call from Mexico and Asia and Africa and the government call for expert architects, farmers and business men to heal the gigantic war wounds of the world, stirred the entire country. The President's proclamation for volunteers along these lines sounded on the hearts and minds of Bradford Ambulance No. 241 like a new call to the colors. And at the close of that memorable day a gathering larger than the parsonage could comfortably contain waited for conference and prayer.

Iceland to Be Independent

ICELAND, though isolated from the rest of the world, insists on attracting attention by her splendid civilization, and by her progress along the line of self-government. She has now become a free and independent state. Iceland belonged to Denmark, and their relations were most happy, but Denmark made an agreement by which the daughter set up house-keeping for herself and became a sovereign state December 1. The agreement recognized that the treaties which had been entered into by Denmark with other nations should hold good with respect to Iceland. It now only remains for the authorities of Iceland to ratify the agreement to set the new nation afloat on the sea of independent self-government. The birth of this new government suggests two very important truths. One is the wise and affectionate treatment of this colony by Denmark.

It was the spirit of Denmark that England manifested toward the Australian colonists who have founded one of the most glorious commonwealths the world has ever known. The same spirit will help her in the settlement of the far more difficult and perplexing Irish question. The second great truth is that where there is general education, a high standard of morals and a Christian faith and life, there must be liberty. Such were the characteristics of Iceland, and such a people cannot be enslaved, nor will they stand injustice or oppression in government. Fetters may be made strong enough to hold the ankles, but no chains that were ever made are strong enough to bend the enlightened intellect, or the converted soul of a man or woman or a nation. Christian nations must of necessity be free. Christ did not teach the necessity for the regeneration of the individual heart more than he did the lesson of a universal democracy for the world. How the swift progress of governments toward freedom illustrates this truth: "If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." (John 8:36.)

Railway Through Desert

UNDER the Moroccan protectorate which France has instituted over Northern Africa there is a plan to fertilize and utilize the Great Sahara Desert. Many artesian wells have been sunk, and it is the plan to dig many more and irrigate the districts around them. It is also planned to tap these oases with a railroad. The project is to push a line from the Mediterranean across the Sahara to Lake Chad in the Sudan and then extend it southward through the Congo, using some of the existing Belgian lines and connecting with the Rhodesian railways at the Katanga border, making

Japanese Girls Worship Luna

THE priests and geisha girls assisting in the religious ceremonials of Japan recently celebrated a festival in honor of Luna in recognition of her goodness in bringing harvest to the fields. This custom has come down the centuries in Japanese history, and has its origin in one of the earliest forms of heathenism. In those dim centuries the sun was worshiped as the ruler of the day, as the active creative force in nature, and the moon, which ruled by night, was adored as the queen of heaven, to whom fruits and grains were brought in sacrifice. In India this goddess was known as Maja, in Assyria as Mylitta, among the Phœnicians as Astarte or Ashteroth, among the Greeks and Romans as Artemis and Diana. The light is breaking, and all the heathen deities in Japan will give way to the Babe in Bethlehem, and worship Jesus, the King of heaven and earth. One of the most hopeful signs of religious progress in Japan is the turning of the young women from the false deity to the blessed Christ. This fact is thus referred to in a volume recently published, "The Christian Movement in the Japanese Empire," edited by Rev. E. T. Iglehart, Methodist missionary in Tokyo. The progress in the plan for a Union Christian Woman's College and its actual inception in the spring of 1918 is one of the triumphs of Christianity. At the summer session special course on ethics, philosophy, history and literature at the Imperial University, 50 of the 700 students attending were women. There is no institution of university rank for women. Medicine is the only profession in which they are given really a moderate opportunity. There are said to be 336 women physicians now practicing in Japan. While the industrial expansion makes a greater demand for women and girl operatives, the wages are still very low. It is doubtful whether the factory law on account of exceptions and evasions has brought much benefit to the laboring classes, especially the women and the children. The prophet foretold the curse that should fall on the nation because the Jewish women in time of famine and pestilence turned away from Jehovah to worship Luna, as the geisha girls did, and "to burn incense unto the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink offerings unto her, as we have done, we, and our fathers, our kings and our princes, in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem: for then had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and saw no evil." (Jer. 44:17.)

he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world." (John 6:33.)

Shooting Yukon Rapids

IN SHOOTING the Whitehorse Rapids of the Yukon, a large raft is used, manned by a crew of eight men and a captain. The oarsmen are not allowed to give any orders; they are not allowed to speak a word; they must listen to the voice of the captain and instantly execute his commands. The captain has to have a quick, keen eye or all will be wrecked. The river of time is full of dangerous rapids and Christ is our Captain to pilot us through them. It is his keen eye that senses danger for us. Amid life's perilous rapids let this be our prayer: "For thy name's sake lead me and guide me." (Ps. 31:3.)

Dr. Butler's Grandfather

IN HIS address at the 152d anniversary of John Street Methodist Church, Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, related the following incident: "There was a raw Irish immigrant boy landed in New York. He boarded with a family which attended the services of the first Methodist Church on the continent. During a revival season the family asked him to go to church with them, and though he was a Catholic boy he consented. The services impressed themselves so powerfully upon him that he gave his heart to God and became a member of this church. He then felt called to preach the Gospel, and giving up his trade as a printer he became an ordained minister, a useful and noted pioneer preacher. That man was my grandfather, the Rev. Dr. Nicholas Murray, who died at Elizabeth, New Jersey. You can imagine with what deep feelings I join in these exercises and how grateful I feel personally to those who founded this church." The earthly value of religion is seen in the raw Irish immigrant printer's apprentice becoming the grandfather of the president of one of the greatest universities in the United States. The incident illustrates the fact that the secret of success in church life is soul-saving. The preacher and members that night were not going for wealth nor for social position, but for souls, the only foundation on which any real church was ever built. And soul-saving is the greatest earthly asset a church can have. It turned the raw Irish immigrant into the honored minister who became the grandfather of one of the leaders of the world's thought, which is only the natural evolution of a regenerated soul. This first society founded in so democratic a spirit, and burning with a zeal for souls, has for that reason been multiplied into thousands of kindred societies with millions of members. This passion for souls must be retained without any reference to wealth and social position if the denomination shall be true to its founders and its divine mission. The leaders and members are determined that the evangelistic spirit in which it was born, and which has given it its life thus far, shall be manifested in still greater force in obedience to this command: "Go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled." (Luke 14:23.)

A Tyrant Dethroned

SEEDERS after coincidences have pointed out that hostilities ceased on the eleventh hour of the eleventh day of the eleventh month. A Bible reader wrote to a New York newspaper that a downfall like the Kaiser's was described in the eleventh verse of the eleventh chapter of the eleventh book of the Bible. The head of a political and military system which taught the creed of physical power merited the condemnation: "Forasmuch as this is done of thee, and thou hast not kept my covenant and my statutes, which I have commanded thee, I will surely rend the kingdom from thee." (I. Kings 11:11.)

Life As a Pilgrimage

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph. D.

DURING the past quarter we have studied the patriarchal period of Hebrew history, from Abraham to Joseph. Our review today we base upon a New Testament letter written by a Christian apostle to Hebrew Christians, wherein the experience of these heroes of faith is appealed to as an inspiration and guarantee for further progress in the following of the call of God. He thinks of these men as those who made the great venture of faith—men who believed and acted upon their convictions, not timid, not "fearful," not devotees of "safety first" in planning their lives. Surely we agree with our writer that the inspiring figures of history have been ever volunteers for tasks of toil and danger who were not afraid to take great risks in dependence upon the Almighty Guide.

The Wandering Founders

Any class will find it interesting to trace our past lessons on a map of Palestine, moving the crayon back and forth over the wandering paths of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and Joseph and his brethren. As soon as one stops to think of it, however, all founders are wanderers and pilgrims in the earth. Think of Paul, pioneer of church-building, as he blazed the first missionary trail around the world. Think of Livingstone, tramping a cross upon the map of Africa. Think of John Wesley, going 5,000 miles a year on horseback through England, besides his visit to America. It is characteristic that our country's founders are called the "Pilgrim Fathers" and America the "land of the Pilgrims' pride," for there have been generations of pilgrims coming here in faith. The heralds of human progress have always been urged on further and further with their messages; for example, the temperance evangelists and the anti-slavery men.

The story of Israel begins with God's command to Abraham: "Get thee out!" The great prophets who wrought out the fundamental principles of religion were moved, like Isaiah, by a commission that began with the word "Go!" The Kingdom of Christ depends now, as in the early days, upon a resolute obedience to the Master who said: "Go ye into all the world." Whether we are to be foreign missionaries or home missionaries is immaterial, for the world problem is one; but that we should all be missionaries is the only Scriptural doctrine of the Christian life.

Holy Places

As we trace the wanderings of the Hebrew founders, we do well to mark each place where they "built an altar" with a cross. Doubtless but a few of the many places of worship are mentioned in the text, but there are enough to be very significant. Where high impulses came to men from God, where great sacrifices were made or noble decisions reached, these are indeed sacred spots. Indeed, just now the aftermath of the world war has surrounded the well-remembered localities of Palestine with new significance and glamour. Many of us would like to be with General Allenby's army as they witness the deliverance from alien oppression of the landmarks of Bible history. We should all like to see Nazareth and Jerusalem, and the "green hill far away, outside a city wall, where the dear Lord was crucified."

Yet it is true still that every place where God's children serve and suffer in faith is holy ground. Bethel is holy because Jacob there saw God as one who follows his child wherever he may go. But the Haystack Monument at Williamstown is also holy, because it is the place where American Christianity heard clearly the call of the world's harvest field. You see, these Biblical towns and villages became holy to those for whom they were the commonplace environments of everyday life. Are we so lacking in vital faith that we cannot realize God's wish to touch with consecration the towns and villages which are the scene of our daily struggle? A long interest in Amos has made the name of Tekoa a loved one to some of us; have we failed to see that the least hamlet in America has as great possibilities?

There is no danger, I trust, of Protestant Christians ever making a superstition of certain localities, as shrines of magic power. So I have found it a splendid privilege to tell our boys and girls about America's holy ground, where Roger Williams landed to found a state with complete religious liberty in its constitution, the elm at Shalunox where William Penn met the Indian sachems, and the site of the Haystack prayermeeting.

Wherever we are called upon to go, that is our holiest land, and there we may lay foundations of the City of God.

Faith's Triumphs Still

How glad we are to know that the heroes of America, like those of Israel, are heroes of faith! Remember Washington's prayers at Valley Forge and his serene calm in the great retreat across New Jersey. Remember Lincoln's "faith that right makes might" and his "firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right." And how gloriously in our day have two millions of Americans gone on a pilgrimage of faith, a real crusade, in the confidence that God willed the liberation of the nations from tyranny and cruelty and wrong!

It is significant to learn that Marshal Foch is a sincere Christian who finds time to pray an hour every day! It is heartening to have Professor Fosdick tell us that the American forces in France are officered by Christian gentlemen. There is a remarkable incident of last spring which has been widely described. It was the dark hour of the Allies, when Germany made her last great drive. Premier Clemenceau, the old Tiger of France, went out to the front in the deepest anxiety. He looked into the calm eyes of Foch and was reassured. Says the Los Angeles Times, "The great agnostic statesman doubted, but Christ's general did not doubt." The faith of the leaders of free nations was stayed on the Ever-living and True God, who today as of old says: "I have seen the afflictions of my people, I have heard their cry, I know their sorrows, and am come down to deliver them. The enemy relied upon force and a fruitfulness instead. Long ago Babylon failed in the same way, while the spokesmen of Jehovah have conquered the whole world with their ideals."

Resolves for the Journey of Life

Now we set up a milestone for another year and journey on. May it be an Ebenezer: "Hitherto hath Jehovah helped us." Perhaps it may not be amiss to suggest three New Year ideals for our pilgrimage this coming year:

I. To gain inspiration for our journey by going on "pilgrimages of the mind" with Moses in our Sunday School Lessons, with Paul in the Twentieth Century New Testament for family worship, with grand old John Bunyan in Pilgrim's Progress which some in our midst have yet to store as a trip surpassing a visit to Jerusalem itself.

II. To build a family altar and keep fire burning upon it continually; that we may not make our spiritual pilgrimage alone.

III. To live this coming year of our Lord 1919 by faith and not alone by sight!

Sunday School Methods

BY FRANK L. BROWN

Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

World Sunday School Plans

FOR two days World Sunday School leaders met in New York planning for a World Sunday School Advancement Movement to meet the challenge of the new day.

Included in that company of men were Hon. John Wanamaker, eighty years young; Mr. H. J. Heinz of Pittsburgh ("57 Varieties"), whom the brewers had blacklisted; Mr. Arthur M. Harris, just back from France, where he served for eight months as treasurer of the Y. M. C. A. at Paris; Marion Laurance, general secretary of the International Sunday School Association; and Fred A. Wells, chairman of the International Association's Executive Committee.

The secretary outlined the policies and plans for the years just ahead: First, to train an efficient missionary and native Sunday school leadership.

Second, to extend the Sunday school organization by providing a trained secretary for every national unit on the world field, and for important area centers within these national boundaries.

Third, to complete an adequate lesson literature in the dialects, and to translate books for the training of Sunday school workers.

Fourth, to broaden Sunday school publicity to cover the non-Christian magazine and secular press upon foreign fields.

Fifth, to develop the Social Service idea in foreign Sunday schools.

Sixth, to launch a world-wide evangelistic campaign through the Sunday school.

Mr. Wanamaker suggested the advisability of planning for a strong evangelistic campaign in Japan, in view of its openness to religious truth, before the Tokyo Convention.

The question as to the time of holding the world's next Sunday School Convention at Tokyo, now that peace is probable, was carefully considered. Thousands of inquiries have been registered in the office of the World's Sunday School Association for this great event. After full discussion it was decided to call the Japanese leaders requesting the suggestion as to a desirable date. The time agreed upon for the Convention will be promptly announced.

At this meeting of the committee on November 20 and 27, the nuptials of the World's and Foreign Sunday School Associations were consummated. For sixty years the Foreign Sunday School Association has been developing Sunday school lay activity, literature, and organization in a number of countries, and more particularly in Europe. This work was founded by the father of Rev. H. C. Woodruff, who became its president after the death of his father. With the advent of the World's Sunday School Association the officers of a committee of the Foreign Sunday School Association felt that the union of the two organizations would best serve the interests of both and avoid confusion. So in the most cordial Christian spirit the union has been effected and the work and resources of the F. S. S. A. will be continued under Mr. Woodruff's direction in the W. S. S. A.

Important plans were discussed for visitation of the foreign fields by lesson specialists to aid missionaries and natives in the making of their lesson systems; to cooperate with the British Committee as desired in giving help to the Russian and Greek Orthodox Churches in meeting the problems of religious education arising out of the separation of church and state; to visit the Orient to lay the plans for the Tokyo Convention; and to study plans for the development of Sunday school work in Moslem fields.

The "Christmas Chest"

THE dear old superstitions that cluster about Christmas! How we smile at them—and yet how barren of meaning would the sweet season be without them!

Santa Claus, the most dearly beloved mythical character that the mind of man has conceived—what does he stand for, perpetuate and personify but the impersonal, secret giving which marks the true Christmas spirit?

Take from our giving that impersonal element which seeks to hide itself behind a fictitious character and gives to want, expecting nothing in return, not even thanks or even identification, and all giving would become mere barter and exchange, every act of kindness carrying a return obligation. Take from our hearts that impersonal spirit, and Santa Claus would die in a day, leaving childhood void of its sweetest joys and manhood and womanhood desolate of their best emotions.

This sweet spirit is finding true expression in our "Christmas Chest"—a fund being made up by our own people for sufferers across the sea. We will soon be transmitting this money by cable for the purchase of Christmas gifts for orphans in Palestine. The fund has mounted in a few weeks to more than $700. Let us make it a full $1,000. It will bring exquisite joy to poor little hearts to whom joy is rare.

Young People's Topics for December 29

Happy New Year. Rules for It
Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topics. Phil. 3: 12-16

AFTER all, a year is only a small bundle of days. Divisions of time are arbitrary, time is absolute. It is well at the beginning of a new calendar year to take stock of our strength and to lay out our course for the days to come. One rule and only one is needful, and that Paul gives clearly in the reference: "I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

What is the mark of your high calling? God will reveal it to you on your knees. The positions in which you may serve him are many, the spirit is always the same. Press always onward, keeping your face ever toward the goal which in your heart you know that God has set you. Never mind the roughness of the present road. It may lead through misunderstandings, through difficult relations with friends and associates, but you may be sure that it will lead safely through. It may mean sacrifice, it may mean working your way through college, it may mean beginning at the bottom in some great enterprise. It may mean temptations to be resisted, habits to be overcome, ideals to be attained, but in His spirit press on and the road will lead through.

Make sure that in the year to come you will cherish no old enmities, harbor no old grudges, judge others not at all, hold yourself ever ready to help a needy person or a deserving cause, or to tell the story of God's love to one in sin or trouble, or to sweeten the experience of a believer with your own. Be certain that all you do is done with a firm determination to excel, that nothing unworthy of the Christ in word or deed or thought enter into your life. Be true to all that is highest and noblest in your heart and mind and soul, and keep ever before you the mark of your high calling, and yours will be a New Year of triumph, a glorious 365 days of constant achievement in spiritual things.

WHY is a crowd enthusiastic? Mostly because enthusiasm is contagious. Religion without enthusiasm is not contagious. Religion with too much enthusiasm is liable to be effervescent and unstable. But in between the two extremes lies a religion of joy unequalled, a religion that paints the sunrise of a new hope on the face, that makes the heart ring with praise, and that sets the tongue to singing. That kind of religion is both catching

False Notions On Teeth-Cleaning

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

They Ignore the Film

The old idea of brushing teeth was to remove food particles. Some ways also aimed to polish teeth.

But time soon proved those methods insufficient. Teeth still discolored, still decayed. Tartar formed, and pyorrhea remained undiminished. Statistics show that tooth troubles constantly increased.

Millions of users have discovered that the tooth brush fails to save their teeth.

Now science knows the reason. It lies in a film—a slimy film—which dentists call bacterial plaque. It constantly forms on the teeth, and it clings. It gets into crevices, hardens and stays. Old-time brush-ing methods could not properly combat it.

That film is what discolors, not the teeth. It hardens into tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Thus tooth troubles are largely traced to that film.

Science now has found a way to combat that film. It has proved itself to many able authorities by four years of clinical tests. Today it is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And we offer you a special tube to let you prove it out.

The Scientific Way

As a cleanser and polisher, Pepsodent holds supreme place among tooth pastes. But it also goes further.

It is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to constantly prevent its accumulation.

But pepsin alone won't do. It must be activated, and the usual activating agent is an acid, harmful to the teeth. So pepsin long seemed forbidden.

Now science has found an activating method harmless to the teeth. Five governments have already granted patents. That method, used in Pepsodent, makes the use of active pepsin possible.

Before it was offered to users, able dental authorities proved its value by clinical tests. They placed its results beyond question. Now we offer the proof to you in the shape of a home test.

Send the coupon for a One-Week tube. Use it like any tooth paste and watch results. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the film. See how teeth whiten—how they glisten—as the fixed film disappears.

A week's trial will convince you that Pepsodent does what nothing else has done. You will see that your teeth are protected as they never were before. You will not return after that, we think, to any old-time method.

Cut out the coupon now.

Dr. Scofield's Amazing Life-Story

Few people have the remotest conception of the supernatural drama of the life of America's greatest Bible teacher. As a boy he unconsciously made ready to prepare the greatest Reference Bible of the English-speaking world.

The youngest United States District Attorney in America was C. I. Scofield—but not yet a Christian. Young lawyer Scofield was at the centre of one of the most sensational political explosions in the nation's history.

Years later, as pastor and Bible teacher, came the insistent call for a new Reference Bible, forcing him to delve into the greatest library treasures of England, Europe and America. Then Satan tried to destroy the new manuscript! The whole amazing life-narrative has for the first time been written by Charles Gallaudet Trumbull, Editor of and fasting, and the people who have it are both blessed themselves and a blessing to all about them. Their very presence opens the doors of the Kingdom to troubled hearts.

"Have I ever won a soul?" It is a question that penetrates the vitals of my faith. If not, why not? Have I no joy in the Lord? Is my faith a cold mental assent to creedal statements? Is my conversation powerful in proof but lacking in conviction? If I have won no soul the fault must be in me, for no man lives entirely among saints, and a really true Christian life must convict sinners. If I must answer this question negatively, what shall I do next?

First, seek a real spiritual assurance of sins forgiven, a heart experience that shall be unmistakable. Then stay on at the mercy seat until I have joy in the Lord. Then ask God to help me to love souls and to crave their salvation to give me the burden of some certain soul. Then transmute my care for a man's soul into acts of loving kindness to him and to others. Then be ready prayerfully to meet expressions of doubt with the certainties of Christ. And above all let me live a life that will prove my faith and approve my testimony. Then may I hope that in the year to come I shall be no longer a passive passenger on the Gospel ship, but a soul winner for Christ.

responsible for the war could not escape because their heads were crowned and must be tried before an international court. Dispatches of November 10 reported an attempt at suicide by William Hohenzollern, former German emperor.

TO MAINTAIN BRITISH FLEET. Winston Spencer Churchill was reported to have declared in a speech on December 5 that the British representatives at the Peace Conference would contend for the absolute abolition of conscription throughout Europe; that they had decided it would not be necessary for Germany to return Heligoland to Great Britain; that they were determined that no limitation should be imposed on Britain's right to maintain her naval defense. Mr. Churchill also stated that Britain had decided on the nationalization of her railroads.

ARMY EXPENSES DROP. The Secretary of War was reported on December 5 to have estimated that out of the $24,000,000,000 appropriated for the War Department during the year $7,000,000,000 might be returned to the Treasury, and an additional sum of $5,000,000,000 was expected to be realized by savings on contracts which would have run into the following year. A billion dollars has also been cut from the estimates for the Navy. Secretary McAdoo estimated the actual cost of the war to America up to December 4 as $13,222,000,000. The War Revenue Bill was reported to the Senate on December 6, having been scaled down by the Senate Committee from a total of $8,182,492,000, as provided in the House measure, to a total of $5,053,466,000. Even at this it is the world's greatest revenue bill. The bill provides for a further reduction to $4,000,000,000 in 1920.

BREAKING AWAY FROM PRUSSIA. Berlin dispatches of December 6 reported a well-developed movement in Westphalia and the Rhine provinces for the creation of an independent republic, the movement being supported by the Centrist and Conservative parties under the leadership of Cardinal Hartmann. The disorders in Berlin and proposals of the Bolsheviks for the separation of church and state and for the nationalization of industry were said to have impelled the church party and the industrial interests into a separatist movement. An attempt of the extreme Bolsheviks, known as Spartacides, to institute a reign of terror in Berlin was reported to have resulted in serious disorders on December 6. These disturbances apparently resulted in the strengthening of the Ebert government. Large delegations of former soldiers sought to make Ebert head of the German Republic and demanded an early meeting of the National Assembly; the latter Ebert promised, while refusing the former.

GERMANY'S BILL. It was announced from London on December 7 that Great Britain would demand an indemnity of 8,000,000,000 pounds sterling or about $40,000,000,000, from Germany to cover the cost of the war to Britain and her dominions. It was said that the French claim for reparation would be very much greater.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The Germans on Dec. 4 delivered to the Allies 300,000,000 francs in gold which had been taken from the Russian Treasury and also returned French art work taken from St. Quentin valued at $400,000,000. . . . It was officially announced on December 5 that during the war 5,622 British ships (9,031,828 gross tons) had been sunk, with the loss of 15,000 men of their crews. . . . Dr. Harr, Garfield resigned as Fuel Administrator on December 3. . . . Next year's budget estimate sent to Congress by the government departments indicated that the expense of the government for the coming fiscal year would be in the neighborhood of $7,443,000,000 as against $24,000,000,000 for the fiscal year just closing. . . . The American, French, British, Italian and Japanese ministers on December 2 presented to the President of China a memorandum expressing the concern of their government over the continued civil strife in China and declaring that they wished to encourage the efforts of both sides toward reconciliation. A similar memorandum was presented on the same day to the heads of the Government at Canton. . . . Testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee investigating the German propaganda campaign disclosed that German attempts to corrupt public officials had been uniformly unsuccessful; that their attempts to buy newspapers of standing had failed except in the case of the New York Evening Mail; that the publications which they supported by contributions proved greatly disappointing to them; and that in spite of the sympathy of many Americans and German-Americans of standing the propaganda campaign was considered a complete failure. Bernstorff was said to have blamed this on the sinking of the Lusitania. . . . Turkish forces retreating from the Caucasus are reported to have murdered and plundered as they withdrew. Ten thousand Armenians are said to have been killed in these massacres. . . . The United States and Peru have raised their respective legations to the rank of embassies. . . . The resignation of Charles M. Sehwarz as Director General of the Emergency Fleet Corporation was accepted by wireless by the President on December 7.

"These Little Ones"

THE weather was singularly balmy for early December. The winds that had tormented the tossing clouds all the morning had quieted down, and the sun smiled from a pale-blue sky. The streets were alive with shoppers and perambulators. Directly in front of a shop-window, brave with holiday toys presided over by the first Santa Claus of the season—red-capped, furred up to his snowy beard, and beaming a broad welcome to passers-by—a plainly-dressed woman had halted to gaze at the pageant. She was drawing a baby-carriage containing a fine boy, perhaps eighteen months old. At sight of the gorgeous array, he shrieked aloud in an ecstasy of joy, and tried to throw himself out of his seat to get a closer view. The woman—presumably the mother, for she did not look like a nursery-maid—shook him back into his place and bade him "sit still and behave!" When the baby struggled in her grasp and began to sob, she trundled the vehicle over to the curbstone to get out of the way of curious observers, and with her bony fingers, that must have stung like a bunch of rattans, beat the chubby fists hard, scolding shrilly, but not loudly, evidently anxious to avoid making a "scene."

Then a strange thing happened! The baby did not scream or struggle. But he cried piteously—under his breath, as it were—and (this went to my heart!) lifted the backs of both hands—reddened by the strokes—to his trembling wet lips and kissed them over and over, the tears raining down upon them while he applied the only salve he could think of.

Mine was not the right to plead for the sobbing child, or to breathe aloud in the mother's ear the text that sprang to my lips then and there:

"Take heed that you offend not one of these Little Ones."

The offender looked like a respectable working-woman. She loved her baby well enough to leave home duties to get the advantage of the mild afternoon for him. Perhaps she meant to buy Christmas gifts for him by-and-by. If his demonstration of delight in what she had brought him to see had been more decorous, she might have sympathized in his joy. But when people looked at her and laughed at him, her temper gave way, and she had "offended"—which I take to mean "hurt"—the Little One. With Christmas almost at our doors!

CHRISTMAS is preeminently the Children's Festival. To deprive them of the distinctive features of the season, established by tradition and hallowed by myriads of tender associations, is rank robbery!

I deprecate as desecration of a holy thing the contempt with which a certain cult of realists refer to "puerile and senseless customs with which our forebears cumbered and belittled what is, when rationally considered, merely an arbitrary churchy anniversary." From the high tableland of mature years, whence one can see above the fogs of prejudice, we, who were brought up by those wise and loving "forebears," tell to the generation following how the Christmases of the olden time are so many gems hung upon a golden chain of memory. We gird at the omission of any one of the "puerile customs." At the festival which will stand for all time and into eternity as the birthday of the Babe of Bethlehem, can we not all become as little children by entering into their simple joys, and yielding ourselves for a few hours to the spirit of the holiday?

I EXULT in the knowledge that in tens of thousands of American households the homely custom of hanging up stockings on Christmas Eve has not fallen into disuse. The array of plethoric hose hung about what stands in the twentieth-century dwelling for the ingleside represents, with religious fidelity, each member of the family. From grandfather's fleece-lined socks and the sisters' silken hose, down to the long stockings swollen to abnormal proportions to accommodate ball and automobile, nobody is overlooked. It should go without saying that the 1918 Christmas tree must be gay with Allied flags and all manner of victorious emblems. Without vexing young brains with suggestions as to the history of the stately evergreen, which is eloquent, all over Christendom, of the perpetual life and beauty of home loves, plant it, "the night before Christmas," with gladness and singleness of heart, and let the children do most of the decoration with their very own hands. Bear constantly in mind, ye elders who have outlived "puerile and senseless customs" (Heaven forgive and pity you!), that you are making autobiography—which will be the poetry of mature age—for each of your little ones. For twenty-four hours forget length of days and cares and responsibilities and "become as little children."

It will be a wholesome exercise of mind and spirit to bethink you, at Yuletide, that those simple words depict the highest beatitude promised to the believer in Him who glorified infancy by the Bethlehem manger, and childhood by his nonage in Nazareth.

NOW for a few words in response to inquiries respecting what English boys and girls call "sweeties," that fill up chinks in stockings and may be hung handily upon the tree.

Will you please tell me how to make those little cookies we buy in the shops? They are not much larger than a silver dollar and are called vanilla cookies.—V. M. C. (Iowa).

Vanilla Cookies

Rub to a cream half a cup of butter with a cup of sugar (or of karo), and when they are thoroughly mixed and really creamy, add half a cupful of sour cream or lopped milk. Next, beat in two well-whipped eggs; lastly, a cupful and a half of flour, sifted twice with a scant teaspoonful of baking-soda. Flavor with vanilla extract—about a teaspoonful. If your dough is not firm enough to handle easily, sift in a little more flour. It should not be too stiff. Roll out quite thin, and cut into rounds with a small wigglass. Bake, covered, until they are firm, then brown lightly.

You may make these into "jumbles" by cutting out with an ordinary cake-cutter, and taking from the center of each round pieces with the top of a bottle. These rings hang jauntily from the trees and the rings cut from the center may be wrapped in tissue-paper and slipped into stockings.

A mother of six writes from Kentucky to learn how to make the sweets that delighted the children of the last generation.

Will you let me have a recipe for the good old-fashioned molasses candy "that Mother used to make"? I don't like to stint my children on candy at Christmas, but sugar is scarce and confectioners are unreasonably in their prices—as I suppose you know.—THE MOTHER OF SIX (Kentucky).

Old-Fashioned Molasses Candy

To this I answer with an old Virginia recipe:

Stir to a smooth, light-colored cream three cups of molasses and one of brown sugar. Beat for at least three minutes, and hard, before stirring in an even tablespoonful of cider vinegar. Bring to the boil slowly, and use the spoon freely as it begins to bubble. In fifteen minutes begin to test the mixture by dropping a little into iced water. When these bits harden after repeated trials, stir into the boiling syrup a heaping teaspoonful of butter. When this is melted, add immediately a teaspoonful of soda dissolved in a tablespoonful of boiling water, and without the delay of a minute remove the kettle from the fire and pour into buttered platters to cool. As soon as you can handle it comfortably, begin to pull into ropes. When these are light yellow and brittle, cut into lengths or braid several strips into such size as you wish.

Caramels may be made of the cooling candy by cutting it into small cubes with a sharp, buttered knife. Or you may cut it into rounds with the top of a bottle. It is particularly nice when pulled with the finger-tips and handled as little as possible with the rest of the hand. Butter or flour very lightly the deft tips to prevent stickiness.

NEW and better things, new and better ways of preparing the familiar things, progress—are the result of constant effort. The Heinz Experimental Kitchen, with its adjoining room for the "tasting committee," is a visible indication of the Heinz policy to produce the best always.

HEINZ

OVEN BAKED BEANS

Save Meat, Wheat and Money

Baked Beans, better than any other food, will help you solve the problem of maintaining a good table at the lowest cost. Heinz Baked Beans are a complete food in themselves—they furnish all the nourishment of meat and bread and they do it at no sacrifice of appetite. For Heinz Baked Beans have a flavor that made them a familiar and welcome dish in thousands and thousands of households in days when high food prices were an undreamed of factor in America.

Heinz Baked Beans are actually baked in real dry-heated ovens. For variety and to please all tastes they are prepared in four ways:

- Heinz Baked Beans with Pork and Tomato Sauce
- Heinz Baked Pork and Beans (without Tomato Sauce) Boston style
- Heinz Baked Beans in Tomato Sauce without Meat (Vegetarian)
- Heinz Baked Red Kidney Beans

All Heinz goods sold in Canada are packed in Canada

THE MODERN PAGE

The arduous struggle to maintain the pace of modern times, accounts for broken health and shattered nerves. Modern strenuousness cannot be changed, but strength wastage may be avoided. The tired, overwrought business-man or woman should find the rich tonic-nourishment of Scott's Emulsion a tower of strength in times of weakness.

The Inhalation Treatment for Whooping-Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs.

Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs. Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping-Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it relieves the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous cold. Mr. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp." The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights. It is called a boon by Asthma sufferers. For the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and as an aid in the treatment of Diphtheria, Cresolene is valuable on account of its powerful germicidal qualities. It is a protection to those exposed. Cresolene's best recommendation is its 39 years of successful use. Sold by Druggists. Send for descriptive booklet. Adventures in Neighboring

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

THERE was a doll to be bought for a "wee sma' friend" of mine in a distant state; so, bundled to my nose in coat and furs, I eagerly joined the throng of Christmas shoppers crowding the New York streets.

It was Saturday afternoon, and somehow I had expected to see the bright faces of mothers and children, and to hear their joyous laughter. But there were no children in sight! And the men and women who hurried by seemed cross and self-absorbed. "Dear me," I thought, "where are the Christmas fairies?" And the answer came: "Where the children are."

"Of course," I agreed; and set out to find them.

I waited until finally a child came by, then followed her. She was a gay little creature in a scarlet coat, hanging to the hand of a laughing young mother.

Presently they hurried in at the doorway of a big department store (I following), and got into an elevator, which shot up out of the grown-up world of toil and moil, into a bewildering world of gnomes and dwarfs, of ugly witches and great trees that opened and shut their boughs.

"Toyland!" bawled the elevator man.

Ah—here were thronged all the boys and girls I had missed from the streets. Here, too, were the Christmas fairies. They were everywhere you looked: in a child's bright glance; in the eyes of a young officer in khaki holding a little girl on his shoulder; in the misty gaze upturned to him by the young wife hanging to his arm. Probably there were lots of other fairies, perched among the toys.

But oh, the toys themselves! And the sights to see!

There was a huge gold spider, run by electricity, that climbed a web as big as the side of a house. There were two giants, enormous fellows, who stretched to their full height, then collapsed again. There were weird trees that whirled; and real Christmas trees that were hung with tinsel and laden with marvelous things. And oh, far off in the forest, there were fairies floating by: gay little creatures in rainbow tints.

And wherever there were not fairies, or gnomes or elves or giants, there were ecstatic children. And the toy-laden tables were like islands rising above a sea of little heads.

I looked out upon this sea, marveling. I had never seen so much happiness before.

Then suddenly the thought came to me: For every rapturous child here today there is somewhere a child desperately unhappy—a small boy or girl who is cold or hungry or lonely, and to whom Christmas will mean nothing. That is, they will, Neighbors, unless we go to the rescue, you and I.

LET us do this, fellow Adventurers. Let us feel, as the following dear woman did, that the children of our community are too precious to be left cold or hungry, lonely or sorrowing on the day that should be the most joyous of all the year.

Taking Christmas to Poor School Children

I would like to tell you what one dear old lady did, for Christmas, several years ago. She was so quiet and unassuming that, although she was constantly carrying sunshine into other lives, I think few of us realized it. Her home—a very humble one—almost touched elbows with a schoolhouse; and she never tired of watching or talking with the children.

One day a neighbor, dropping in to chat for a few moments, was surprised to find genial Aunt E—with a guilty look on her face and evidently in too great a hurry about something to be her own gracious self. From the kitchen came savory odors. Aunt E—laughed, and said: "I can't take those things out of my oven without you carrying away the impression that I have lost all the sense I am supposed to have; so I'm just going to 'fess up.' Look!" Opening the oven door, she drew out three saucer pies followed by the same number of gingerbread men with wonderful raisin eyes. Then she looked up at her visitor.

"It's for the children," she explained. "You see, with no one but Henry and myself to cook for, sometimes I fairly ache to bake goodies for the little folks. Some of the poor dears are starved for such things; yes—and for the essentials, too. I told you I was going to confess, but I am afraid you will be shocked when I tell you that one morning I peeped into one of the dinner pails that always hang so temptingly near me; and honest, honey, as true as I live, every morsel that child had for dinner was about three inches of what my mother used to call spider bread or long cake. Not a mite of butter or sweet. And that hunk of bread was burned almost to a cinder. And the doctors say that child is anemic."

"Of course, her folks are shiftless. They wouldn't 'be on the town' half the time if they weren't. But since they have children to turn out in the world, we can't let them starve. After I had looked in one pail, I decided I might as well go the limit; and I found two more buckets that didn't have enough to keep a cat alive. So I've been slipping in a few things every day. I'm sure the children do not suspect me; for I'm really becoming—sly! Yes, I am! But I don't care. I've been watching the pink coming in that poor girl's face; and the boys can hardly wait to grab their buckets. But I am worried about their clothing. They are not half clad."

The Neighbor laughingly told her she was going home to don her thinking-cap, as she did not approve of one woman appropriating all the good deeds of the neighborhood.

As the Christmas holidays approached, Aunt E's home had many callers; and from the windows facing the school keen eyes measured the approximate length of skirts and jackets, and took note of mittenless fingers, ragged stockings and gaping shoes.

When the last day of school arrived, a wonderful program was given; and while it was in progress Aunt E—made hurried trips from home to the school hall, where hung wraps and dinner pails. The buckets were soon filled to overflowing; and in shabby jacket pockets or swinging from hooks were left neatly wrapped parcels, bearing the name of the one whose wraps hung from that particular hook. No word of greeting was attached to give hint of the donor.—M. M. L., Maryland.

That little adventure brought a mist to my eyes and a choky lump to my throat. It is one of those proofs of the sanctity of Christmas and the nobility of the human heart which leave us without words.

OUR next Adventure tells again of Christmas joys brought into the lives of little folk who would otherwise have gone without.

Christmas Tree for Young Neighbors

One winter when my daughter was teaching in a "backwoods district," she discovered a family with six children in the family, the eldest fourteen years of age, which had never known what Christmas was.

So we planned to give those children a Christmas.

My youngest daughter and I helped the "teacher girl" to make a present of some sort for every child; and on Christmas Eve the young man came for us with his bob-sleds. With lots of apples, candy, mince pies, etc., we bundled into the sleds and went over to the home of the family, which was fifteen miles away. "Teacher girl" had helped the oldest boy to get a tree from the woods and set it up in one corner of the living-room. This we all helped him to trim with strings of popcorn, bags of candy and so on, placing the packages about on the tree. When the candles were all in place, and ready to light, we had a little program.

I read the Christmas story from Matt. 2: 1-12, and offered a prayer. Then we all sang a Christmas hymn. The teacher girl and her young sister and brother each recited a Christmas poem. After which we sang another hymn. Then the candles were lighted, and the young man distributed the presents, candy and apples. Such joy I never before witnessed as those children displayed. The mother, with tears of happiness in her eyes, thanked us for our thoughtfulness.—Mrs. I. F. McC., Montana.

Dear as our own little family gatherings at Christmas are, comrades, none could be more wonderful than such a gathering as that one. Perhaps, this Christmas, some of us, instead of celebrating around our own hearthfire, will pack up our goodies, hop into a sleigh, and share our Christmas cheer with some family less fortunate.

OR ELSE, planning on even a broader basis, perhaps many of us this year will work toward a community Christmas, though it be, like the following, a very simple celebration indeed.

Community Christmas in the Pennsylvania Hills

The Christmas I wish to tell you about I spent among very poor people in a backwoods place miles from any town. Their homes were small, stony farms on top of a rugged, windswept Pennsylvania hill; but their hearts and doorways stood wide open, and their lives were as pure as the mountain air.

The adventure began weeks before Christmas. A Community Christmas Tree with appropriate exercises was planned. Jolly evenings were spent round the roaring wood fire in the draughty old schoolhouse where the young folks "practiced speaking" and sang Christmas carols.

Several days before Christmas, a team of horses was hitched to a long sleigh, and everybody and his folks piled in. The sleighing was fine, and it was a jolly ride to town to "get things" for the tree. We ate dinner in a restaurant; which was no small part of the adventure. Then, our shopping done, we had another merry ride home, followed by supper in the largest house in the neighborhood.

The school grounds looked Christmasy any time of year, for they boasted thirty-five grand old pine trees. What we did to that old schoolhouse would give pause to a professional window-trimmer. The tiny organ was gay with a pink cheesecloth scarf; and bright paper chains mingled with the festoons of evergreen. The neighbor women hung on the tree for each other gifts of exquisite needlework.

How we enjoyed that Christmas Eve! The very air was vibrant with praise and worship as those devout Christian people told in story and song of the Bethlehem Babe who chose to be born among the poor. The faces of the children were like jewels as they bent over their new dollies and sleds, the pretty aprons and ribbons they received.

Free from selfishness and worry, we walked home from our Community Christmas Tree (where Christ, and not Santa Claus, had been crowned King) under the same stars that shone on a manger and Babe two thousand years ago.—M. SMITH, New York.

Just one more Adventure, Neighbors before I must wish you "Merry Christmas and Many of Them."

AGAIN, in this account, we hear of a loving effort to bring Christmas joy to little children in need of it.

Christmas for Children in Hospital

Several years ago it was my privilege to spend the holiday season in a hospital helping care for sick and crippled children.

A few days before Christmas, some kind-hearted women came to the hospital and learned the wishes of the little folks there. And then one afternoon we had a Christmas tree beautifully decorated, with the gifts underneath it. The children were present in all conditions; some in wheel chairs, others sitting up in bed, others lying down; but all happy and eager. At the appointed hour, the boys from the choir of a nearby cathedral came and sang sweetly the Christmas story so often sung and told. After which the gifts were given out.

If you could have seen the children with their gifts! It was a very moving sight. I only regret that the warm-hearted women who planned the Christmas Tree were not present that night, to see the children all tucked snugly in bed, each with his or her toy hugged closely to the little heart. If you would know the real joy of Christmas, make possible a Christmas tree of this kind.—GRACE A. MANCHESTER.

AND now, friends, my candle has burned low, and I must snuff it out and say "Good-night, Merry Christmas, and God bless you," until we meet again!

The Neighbors' Forum

May I suggest that we do not forget the old folks—the dear grandmothers—this Christmas? How many of us realize that possibly grandma never had a Christmas tree in her childhood days years ago? It is with real joy and in very tender memory that I go back to a Christmas, four years ago, when I went to the woods, and cut and brought home and decorated grandma's first Christmas tree.—NEIGHBOR, New York.

I am an afflicted invalid, living quite alone. Looking for the mail is the greatest pleasure I have in life. Will be grateful for letters, cards, etc., of Christmas cheer and helpful sympathy.—A LONELY NEIGHBOR IN THE SOUTH.

DEAR NEIGHBORS: Another batch of games has come to my desk. These are suitable for a gathering of young folks. To any one sending me a stamped, self-addressed envelope I will be glad to mail full directions for playing these games.—VERA L. CONNOLLY.

Additional Views of Church Unity As a Basis of Spiritual Success

This is un-American and undemocratic. The new Church needs leaders and ministers, not drivers and dictators.

This new Church must also be broad and tolerant; not compromising with evil, but willing to admit all good. Thus it may render such service as the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A. are giving. Then, in a small community like the one where I live—where there are about two hundred church-going people and two churches with three preaching services every Sunday and two Sunday schools—one building might be used for preaching services, and the other for the kind of service the Y. M. C. A. is giving our boys in France. In that way we could reach some we cannot help now and render better service to all. We might have two workers, one a preacher of the Gospel, the other a superintendent of recreation, religious education, etc. Many of our men and ministers will come back from France wanting such service and willing and able to give it. Now is the time to make some move for its establishment.

Here, then, we have the fundamental principles of this new Church: Christian, American, broad, great and good. Into this Church may be brought all that is good. When some denominational leaders will prepare the way for such a Church, men everywhere will be ready and anxious to join it. The leaders of some of our denominations might meet and work out a plan for such a Church, and send this plan especially to our smaller and over-churched communities, with the request that all who are ready to join it may sign their names. The result would be surprising. The details as to property ownership, etc., can easily be worked out locally with a little leadership.

Let us pray, plan and work for it. Let ministers preach on the need of it. Let church members' petition their denominational leaders to take steps toward the establishment of this Church. I for one am willing to do anything I can to bring it about. This is no impractical dream. It is going to come! Many, many earnest Christians are waiting for it. But the harder we work, the sooner it will come.

May God speed the coming of the Christian American Church!

A California Minister's View

THE churches of Protestant America, to meet the situation, should preach the Gospel to regenerate the souls of men and to generate a new enthusiasm for righteousness and truth.

They should bring together all the subdivisions in the leading denominations, and when this is done, then bring the denominations together which are nearest alike in teachings and practice. For example: Let the sixteen kinds of Methodists be made one body; let the seventeen kinds of Baptists be brought together; let the fourteen kinds of Presbyterians be under one General Assembly. The Lutherans have recently united many of their subdivisions and are an example to others. Then let the Presbyterians and the Congregationalists cooperate and unify their forces; let the Methodists, Episcopalians and Lutherans work together. The Baptists and the Disciples could unite and cooperate as one body. This plan would simplify church work, unify Christian effort, minimize the needless expenditure of money, and help to answer the prayer of our blessed Lord (John 17).

They should simplify their creed for all Christians into a brief statement, its essence being faith in the Lord Jesus Christ and obedience to his Will and Word. This statement presents the Father's will and the Holy Spirit's work in glorifying Christ, and no reasonable objection would be raised against it on the part of the Christians or the world.

There should be a complete unification of forces under one supreme leader. Christ Jesus, with unquestioning loyalty to him, who has promised to lead his forces forward to complete victory over evil and selfishness, and the establishment of his Kingdom in all the world.

There should be complete obedience to Christ, by which the knowledge of God and communion with him are assured, and by which peace, purity and power may be realized in the lives of men spiritually, mentally and physically.

Christ must be first and last in teaching and life; then economic, social and commercial conditions will find a solid, enduring and complete basis for their freest, truest and fullest development.

A practical and simple method like that presented above would conserve all the good of the past, unify Christian effort for the present, and assure unlimited power and success for the future.

A Louisiana Pastor Urges Unity on Essentials

I HAVE read with deep interest the replies to your questionnaire: "What should the churches of Protestant America do to meet the religious situation after the war?" and am glad to note the strong undercurrent of unanimity among those who made reply. I feel irresistibly drawn to make a small contribution toward the work of rebuilding the Temple. For it seems that "reconstruction" and "elimination" are the words representing the nature of the work to be done.

I am now nearly seventy years of age, and have spent about forty of them in the ministry. I have often wondered at the great waste of time, money and energy in the efforts made by the various denominations to keep their lines of distinction plainly marked, instead of pointing out the relationship they bear to each other. It seems to me that if the Church can succeed in proving that the Bible is the documentary evidence of one God, that Jesus Christ is his ultimatum, and that the resultant of that ultimatum is: "See that thy neighbor dwells securely by thee," then she will be given carte blanche by all nations, kindreds and tongues, and a universal world-peace will be the logical outcome.

May the Lord God of hosts lead in this most critical period in the world's history is my prayer.

The Transformation Already Under Way

TO YOUR editorial, "Is a New Reformation at Hand?" I would reply: Yes, it is; and it has been under way for these many years. Its consummation has been accelerated by the world war. We have yet to see the abandonment of sectarian distinctions; the abolishment of imperialism in church authorities; the simplifying of church procedure, following only the example of the great Preacher, our Redeemer; the liberalizing of individual thought, free from autocratic creeds and teachers; the individual meeting with his brother in worship on the Lord's day. The wayfarer would then always be at home and hear only of the united Church for which the Saviour prayed.

THE prison-shadowed home is a sad place indeed at the children's happiest festival, when all the world is celebrating the birth of the Christ-child. Mrs. Ballington Booth, through her organization, the Volunteer Prison League of the Volunteers of America, 34 West 28th Street, New York, has for years endeavored to ameliorate the condition of the children and wives of men who from their prison cells are powerless to support their families. Every Christmas she has tried to play Santa Claus in hundreds of these desolate homes, to lift the burden from the shoulders of the mothers, and to bring a little Christmas gladness to the little ones. The Volunteers of America is a duly incorporated society, and the Prison League is a department of its work.

Help Heal the Wounds of War

IN the first blush of joy over the coming of peace many of us have forgotten that the wounds of war heal even more slowly than the casualties of conflict. The armistice put an end to fighting but it did not end hunger. It did not restore husbands to widows or fathers to orphans. These, whom we of the Christian Herald family have, for four years, been providing with the mere necessities of existence, still hold out to us pleading hands. We must help them, if the work we have so long maintained is to finish its course. Another crop year will make many things right but a winter intervenes, a winter when fuel will be scarce and food meagre in many places. The Allied nations will superintend much of the necessary relief work but they will need to use our committees along with every other organization in the various fields in order to make relief effective. We must maintain and reinforce our committees and we need to give especial care to Armenia, Syria and Palestine. Over 400,000 orphans remain from the sufferings and persecutions of those terrible years. The Christian Herald, in co-operation with the American Colony in Jerusalem, has already made a beginning toward an orphanage in the Holy City. Funds made available by your gifts have been sent to cover first costs and more will be set aside as the way opens and God leads us on. Full announcement of this new work will be made later. Keep the gifts coming. They are life and hope and a new day for thousands of needy ones in many lands.

Let him do the worrying

YOU will be giving all the ill-assorted crew of skulking lawbreakers something to worry about—

When you give them the forcible hint of "Yale".

Mr. Burglar is smart and experienced enough to know that a "Yale" Night Latch means a deadline for him. Install Yale Night Latches to reinforce those doubtful locks already on the doors.

Outside the house Yale Padlocks chill all his enthusiasm to "force" and "pry". Install Yale Padlocks on cellar doors, and chests and boxes. And on garages.

That "Yale" trade-mark is all you need to see. Look for it on Night Latches, Padlocks, Cabinet Locks, Builders' Hardware — on Door Closers — and on Bank Locks and Chain Blocks.

Why Take Less Than Your Full Share of Pleasure, Health and Happiness?

Why deny yourself the super-joys, the super-pleasures and the super-happiness? Why deny yourself the best there is in existence? Why deny yourself these advantages when they are so easily available, and when it is so absolutely certain that you can attain them? Why, in other words, live the inferior life in preference to the superior—the genuinely successful life? Why cheat yourself of the advantages of life? Why deny yourself this super-energy, this super-power, this super-health, this super-vitality, and this super-activity of personality and mind, that is made easily and absolutely possible through progressive evolution, self-evolution, scientific evolution, personal evolution through Conscious Evolution.

WHAT OTHERS HAVE TO SAY:

"Conscious Evolution has done all for me that you promised and I am simply radiating good health. I can hardly believe it myself, it has made such a great change in me. I am in better condition than I have been for twenty years and am chuck full of energy and ambition. Tasks that were a burden to me in the past are now easy and a pleasure. I have no money to burn or throw to the birds, but if you were to offer me one thousand dollars in good hard cash and put me back where I was before beginning your system, I would say, 'Nothing doing.' I enjoy the work you have mapped out for me and am impatient to get at it.

"I SHALL BE SIXTY-SIX YEARS OLD NEXT AUGUST and if you were to see me right now you would say 'forty,' and, as a fact, I am better, stronger, and have more energy than the average man at forty. I have only you and your system to thank for these things, and I want to thank you from the very bottom of a grateful heart for what you have done for me. I am a man now in every sense of the word, whereas I was only a fraction of a man and rather a small fraction before profiting through Conscious Evolution.

"The strangest part of it all is that my hearing is greatly improved. The muscles of my shoulders, back and abdomen are immense, and I have forgotten that I have a liver, kidneys, heart, or any other organs, except my stomach which makes a loud call three times a day. I have lost all desire for stimulants.

"I AM SEVENTY-ONE YEARS OF AGE, and in three weeks your system has apparently made a new man of me. I am so enthusiastic over Conscious Evolution that it is difficult for me to control myself, and not do more than you say. I want to thank you for the interest you are taking in my case. When I wrote you for your instructions I was in a very desperate condition. I have never been sorry for one minute that I have written you. On the contrary, I want to thank you for what you are doing for me. I am getting along fine; I am a wonder to myself. It does not seem possible that there could be such a change in any one in such a short time."

"When I tell some of my friends how quickly I was benefited by Conscious Evolution, they do not believe me. They think I exaggerate."

"One year ago I was an old man at forty; to-day I am a youth at forty-one."

"I must state that the principle of your system is the most scientific, and at the same time the simplest, I have ever heard. You do not misrepresent one single word in your advertising."

"Just think of it, five weeks ago I was ashamed of my physique; to-day I am almost proud of it. I am delighted with Conscious Evolution."

"Fourteen years ago at the age of sixty-eight I was an old man; to-day at the age of eighty-two I am the marvel of my friends; I am younger than most men of forty. Your system gave me a new lease on life."

"Last week I had a reading of my blood pressure, and was gratified to learn that it was fully ten points below the previous reading. This was a surprise to me as well as to my physician, who did not believe that my blood pressure could be reduced because of my advanced age."

"Doctors told me I had hardening of the arteries and high blood pressure. They advised me exercise. Conscious evolution reduced my blood pressure and made a new man of me."

"The beauty of your whole advertisement is that every word of it is the truth. Your system is the most wonderful in the world; it gave me new energy, strength and life; in other words, it made a new man of me. I have been an advocate of your system since the first day I used it; I have withstood a mental strain during the past year which would have broken my health had it not been for your system."

"Can't describe the satisfaction I feel."

"Worth more than a thousand dollars to me in increased mental and physical capacity."

"I have been enabled by your system to do work of mental character previously impossible for me."

"I was very skeptical, now am pleased with results; have gained 17 pounds."

"The very first lessons began to work magic. In my gratitude I am telling my croaking and complaining friends, 'Try Swoboda.'"

"Words cannot explain the new life it imparts both to body and brain."

"It reduced my weight 29 pounds, increased my chest expansion 5 inches, reduced my waist 6 inches."

"I cannot recommend your system too highly, and without flattery believe that its propagation has been of great benefit to the health of the country."

"My reserve force makes me feel that nothing is impossible, my capacity both physically and mentally is increasing daily."

"I have heard your system highly recommended for years, but I did not realize the effectiveness of it until I tried it. I am glad indeed that I am now taking it."

"Your system developed me most wonderfully."

"I think your system is wonderful. I thought I was in the best of physical health before I wrote for your course, but I can now note the greatest improvement even in this short time. I cannot recommend your system too highly. Do not hesitate to refer to me."

"You know more about the human body than any man with whom I have ever come in contact, personally or otherwise."

"Your diagnosis and explanation of my brain trouble was a revelation to me. I have had the best physicians of my State, but your grasp of the human body exceeds anything I have ever heard of known. I have read your letters to many people, also to my physicians, who marvel at them."

"I feel that I must express once more my sincerest and warmest appreciation of the benefit you have given me. Had anyone told me that I could possess such fine quality of body and such development as I do at present, after nine weeks of Conscious Evolution, I would have said that they were raving mad. You have proved beyond the shadow of a doubt that you can do everything you say; in fact, I believe you really do more than you promise. Results have been so startling in my case that I feel that I have been born again. At the time of writing I feel full of life, energy and ambition. My body has assumed a most graceful shape of which I am more than proud and thank the day that I ever heard of you. I could write you a whole lot about your Conscious Evolution, I feel so thankful. There is no better value on God's earth than what you offer, and anyone who doubts your statements must be indeed more than skeptical. I would consider it an honor to have you use my letters in every way you think fit."

Evolution—consciously brought about through Conscious Evolution—is the beginning of a new era. Will you continue to live in the old conditions, or do you intend to enter the new life—the better life, the superior life, the pleasurable life, the joyous life, the successful life, and the happy life?

"I am very thankful that the Lord directed me to Conscious Evolution through the 'Christian Herald.'"

These Amazing Books Are For You

Swoboda has published for distribution two remarkable books which explain his system of Conscious Evolution and what it has already done. Write for these books—not because Conscious Evolution has meant so much to 200,000 other men and women, not because there is scarcely a prominent family in the country that hasn't at least one member a pupil of Swoboda, including Charles E. Hughes, Woodrow Wilson, Daniel Williard, Rockefeller, the Vanderbilts, the Goulds, the Huntingtons, the Armours, the Cudahys, the Swifts—but write for these books because they mean so much to YOU in multiplied living power, earning power and resisting power. They are big books filled from cover to cover with the vital facts about yourself and how you can acquire the degree of perfection in body and mind that you so much desire. They explain the dangers of excessive deep breathing, excessive exercise, and excessive muscular development.

"Conscious Evolution" and "The Science of Life" will show you how you can increase the pleasures of life to a maximum—how to intensify them and how to make your life more profitable, pleasurable and joyous.

"Conscious Evolution" and "The Science of Life" are the A, B, C of evolution and persistent youth. These books explain Conscious Evolution and the human body as it has never been explained before. They explain the Swoboda theory and the laws of mind and body. They startle, educate and enlighten. They explain as never before the reason for the evolution of the mind and body.

Regardless of how young you may feel, of how efficient you may think you are—regardless of how active, energetic and alert you may consider yourself—regardless of how happy, how contented you may pride yourself on being—regardless of how healthy, wealthy or successful you may be, you cannot afford, in justice to yourself, to miss the interesting and instructive secrets explained for the first time in these startling new books.

A mere reading of "Conscious Evolution" and "The Science of Life" will so fill you with enthusiasm and ambition, that you will not rest until you have yourself acquired the Swoboda kind of health and energy by cultivation and revitalizing intensively every cell, tissue and organ in your own system. Tear out the coupon on this page, write your name and address on it or write a letter or a postal card and mail it today. Even if you gain but one suggestion from them, you will have been repaid a thousand fold for having read them. I urge you by all means not to delay, not to say, "I'll do it later," but to send NOW, while the matter is on your mind. Remember, these books are absolutely free for you to keep—there is no charge or obligation now or later. Write NOW. Address

MANY abnormal conditions, developed since the beginning of the war, have brought trouble and heartache to France.

Many disasters have touched a brave people with acute anguish and sorrow. But France, from her highest general to her tiniest slum child, met every condition, every disaster, with an undaunted spirit.

One of the scourges that France is fighting is tuberculosis. This disease has been a most stubborn foe of civilized peoples. Its ills are accentuated by conditions of overcrowding, undernourishment and exposure brought on by the war. It is being fought with the same determination as were the battles on the western front.

It was early in 1917 that the Rockefeller Foundation, acting through its International Health Board, offered to cooperate with the French government in the control of the disease. On receiving assurance that their assistance would be acceptable the board appointed a Commission for the Prevention of Tuberculosis in France—a commission which arrived in Paris in July of the same year, made a careful though rapid survey of the field, and began active operations in September.

The work of the commission was, from the very first, divided into three distinct classes. Perhaps the most important—certainly the first of the three—was the Tuberculosis Dispensary Service.

The dispensary service has two branches—a city branch in Paris and a rural branch. Each branch is the center of a complete system of dispensaries, with modern equipment and trained personnel. They are all under the auspices of the French government (for the local arrangements for publicity and lectures. I was talking about the tuberculosis situation in France with a member of the International Health Board the other day. When I rose to leave I asked him if I might use his name.

"I'd rather not," he answered; "I'd rather not have my name mentioned. You see, we are trying to keep personalities out of this work. It really isn't a work that we are doing—it's a work that we are helping France to do. We don't want to go over there and take the matter out of her hands—and we aren't. France is working out her own salvation!"

FRANCE is working out her own salvation! For France has realized that one of the gravest enemies of any land is disease. And France has realized that tuberculosis is the most terrible of all diseases. And France—under the guidance of America, her ally—has opened a campaign against that enemy. It is a campaign that has spread over the land to such an extent that even the smallest children can converse intelligently on preventive measures—they talk about the advantages of fresh air and hygiene as they used to talk about dolls.

The world watched breathlessly a few years ago as a brave blue-coated army rolled back a gigantic enemy on the banks of the Marne. And the world watches now while they fight this other enemy which also they will conquer.

keynote of the commission is not to teach France, but to work with France), although American supervision is there.

THE second division of the work is the organization of a body of visiting nurses. This division has been something of an innovation, for, while visiting nurses are a very real and necessary part of our hospital and social service work, they have, in the past, been practically unknown to France.

The position of visiting nurse is an important one, for, while the dispensary will diagnose and medically care for the patient, it is through the visiting nurse that the homes will be reached and incipient cases discovered.

The visiting nurse links up the dispensary with private and community life. She it is who discovers that children are hungry. She it is who sees that other children, children who are in the first stage of the disease, are sent away to some place where there will be fresh air. She it is who effects a reform in individual and family hygiene. She it is who sees that school children have nourishing soup for luncheon and wholesome bread for supper!

women. And so, to meet the situation, three centers have been established for the training of these women. It is an interesting branch of the commission's work, but it is the third division that is the most interesting. For the third division has to do with the younger generation. The third is a campaign of education.

TO educate a nation one must go, first of all, to the little children. And so it is toward the little children that the educational work of the commission has been directed. The schools of the cities and the rural districts are visited, there are many and complete exhibitions shown, and even a primer for the prevention of tuberculosis has been printed—a primer that is called "Aux Enfants de France" (For the Children of France), illustrated by a clever artist to catch the childish eye, and written in language simple enough for any child to understand.

The central feature of the educational work is the traveling exhibit. This exhibit is mounted on motor trucks, each one of which carries a motor generator to produce the current for moving pictures, a moving-picture machine with films, slides, and screens, a complete exhibit of

SHALL THE EVANGELICAL CHURCHES UNITE?

IT OUGHT TO BE DONE, IT CAN BE DONE,
IT SHALL BE DONE says the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE

By H.K. Carroll, L.L.D

DR. CARROLL was the compiler of the first Religious Census for the United States government. He is accepted as the leading authority on religious statistics. His estimate of the progress and practicability of the present nation-wide movement for Church Unity, not necessarily involving the dissolution of the denominations, as here presented with the advantage of a thorough knowledge of the situation, is one that will be read with interest in all the organizations.

A TRULY great proposal—great in its aim, great in its faith, great in its scope, and great in its possibilities—has just been launched in the City of Philadelphia.

The initial action in this most notable movement was taken by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America at its May meeting (1918) in Columbus, Ohio. This church has been very earnest in its endeavors to promote organic union. It has made overtures to this end, at various times, to the United Presbyterian Church, the Presbyterian Church in the United States (Southern), the Reformed Church in the United States and the Reformed Church in America, and to the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. It effected union with the Cumberland Presbyterians some ten or twelve years ago; but failed of satisfactory results in the other cases. At Columbus, where it was informed that its proposal for union with the Southern Presbyterian Church had been declined, nothing disconcerted, it proceeded to launch a much larger plan—the merging of the Evangelical bodies of all names into one Church of Christ, and directed its standing Committee on Cooperation and Union to arrange for a Council of Representatives of the Churches to consider the matter and take such action as might be deemed best.

The preliminary conference which met in Philadelphia December 4-6 was the outcome of the action at Columbus. Fifteen denominations were represented in the Conference, twelve officially and three unofficially, as follows:

1. Northern Baptist Convention
2. Congregational Churches
3. Disciples of Christ
4. Evangelical Synod of North America
5. Society of Friends (unofficially)
6. United Lutheran Church (unofficially)
7. Methodist Episcopal Church
8. Moravian Church
9. Presbyterian Church in U. S. A.
10. Protestant Episcopal Church
11. Reformed Church in America (unofficially)
12. Reformed Church in the United States
13. United Brethren in Christ
14. United Presbyterian Church
15. Welsh Presbyterian Church

Church Leaders in the Movement

THE representatives of these Churches, as appointed, nearly 150 in number, consist mainly of members of commissions of those bodies on Christian Union or Unity. About 120 of them were in attendance, so that it was neither a small nor an unrepresentative body of men to inaugurate so important a movement. The names are those of strong men in each denomination, who have attained to leadership through achievement and ability. All but about a score are ministers. Among the personnel are these: the Rev. Doctors Cornelius Woelfkin, New York, and Carter Helm Jones of Philadelphia, Baptists; Professor Williston Walker, New Haven, Rev. Doctors H. C. Herring, Boston, and C. E. Burton and Charles S. Macfarland of New York, Congregationalists; Rev. Doctors Peter Ainslie, Baltimore, Finis Idleman, New York, and F. A. Burnham, Cincinnati, Disciples of Christ; Rev. Dr. John F. Baltzer, St. Louis, president of the Evangelical Synod of North America; Professor Rufus M. Jones, Haverford, Pa., and Mr. Stanley R. Yarnall, Germantown, Pa., of the Society of Friends; Rev. Doctors H. A. Weller and Henry E. Jacobs, Philadelphia, of the United Lutheran Church; four bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church—Berry, Hamilton, Wilson, Cooke, and Rev. Doctors D. G. Downey and Frank Mason North, New York; Bishop C. L. Moench and Dr. Paul de Schweinitz, Bethlehem, Pa., Moravians; Rev. Doctors J. Frank Smith, Dallas, Texas, Moderator of the Presbyterian Church, and Rev. Doctors W. H. Roberts, Philadelphia, J. Ross Stevenson, Princeton, N. J.; nine bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church, including Bishop Anderson, Chicago, chairman of the Faith and of the delegates thought it would be better to talk to something more definite and proposed a committee to consider and report a tentative plan as a guide to discussion. Both ideas were eventually harmonized, and a committee of two from each delegation was created, of which the business committee was the nucleus, and the speaking went forward. The trend of the speeches was much more favorable than many expected; indeed, it was remarkable how thoroughly the delegations agreed as to the desirability, even the necessity, of closer relations.

Ideas and Sentiments Expressed

THE spirit and purpose of this preliminary gathering are to be ascertained from the free expressions of those present. The following will serve to show that the Conference was not characterized by the caution of timidity or by uncertainty as to the disadvantages of the present condition of the Churches in their divided state, or as to the desirability of an effective remedy. The moderator of the United Presbyterian General Assembly, Dr. W. M. Anderson, said: "We do not come to you in the spirit of 'I am holier than thou'; but in the spirit of fraternal union." He predicted

Bringing In the Halt and Maimed

THE world-famed and much regretted surgeon Samuel Pozzi, a very old friend of mine, said on April 23, 1915, in a lecture to the Paris Renaissance: "Never has the art of destruction been carried further, nor the art of relieving and curing achieved greater conquests."

There are millions of dead in France for whom we weep, and whilst bowing to God's will, we are sometimes comforted by the thought that much suffering has been spared to them. But there are thousands of our men who have lost a limb or part of one; there are those who through wounds or disease no longer enjoy the perfect use of all their limbs. We are told to go out into the highways and hedges and bring in the halt, the maimed, the blind and bid them sit down at the banquet of life. This the greatest minds in France are trying to do.

M. Edouard Herriot, the mayor of Lyons, has done more. From the first day of the war he determined to give those men more than momentary relief, to create a new interest for them, make them once again take their stand in the arena of life, give them not only back to industry and commerce—whose development will be the first aim of France after the war—but restore them to the joy and responsibilities of family life. These lofty aspirations he embodied on November 23, 1914, in an appeal through the Paris press, and seven days later the Lyons municipal council decided that a professional school for wounded soldiers unable to take up again their former trades should be opened at Lyons to teach them new occupations.

A school was opened, on a smaller scale than the present one at Tourvielle, in the château de la Buire. To this turreted mansion, where rubble, sacks of lime, buckets of mortar and whitewash were standing about, M. Herriot, on December 16, 1914, led the three first candidates or pupils. Here accountants, carpenters, toymakers, bookbinders, bootmakers were to be taught their trades. The organization of the teaching was entrusted to a Belgian technical expert.

M. Herriot was determined to give back to the world not merely passable workmen, but real and efficient ones, whose professional, intellectual and moral worth would counterbalance their physical defects. He can proudly say that the great work initiated by him, and to which he so wisely associated Dr. Carle, an authority in such matters, has succeeded beyond all hopes. Together they gradually vanquished the difficulties—material and otherwise—and misunderstandings which a work of this kind calls forth. Today there are many similar schools in France—due to private or municipal efforts. The ideas of the neutrals, even those of the enemy, have contributed, the first French school for wounded in its turn giving advice. But few, if any, of the newer institutions have reached the point of excellency of the mother-school at Lyons, inspired as it was by the great heart and soul of a genius, admirably practical and wonderfully well thought out.

Wounded soldier learns woodworking

THE Lyons municipality valiantly hastened its work, and the Ecole de rééducation professionnelle pour Grandés Blessés at Tourvielle was opened on May 15, 1915, with twenty-seven bootmakers' apprentices and two horticulturists. By that time there were far more than one hundred in the first school, now named Ecole Joffre, in honor of our hero of the Marne.

At the gates of Lyons, in the old domaine of Tourvielle, stands a farmhouse which, modernized, walls and windows being knocked out to give air, served at first as school and home at the same time. The question has been much debated if it is advisable for the pupils to live at the school, but to the founder it was clear from the very first that the proper care of the mutilés' moral, mental and physical welfare was only possible in this way. Surrounded by green meadows and fruit-trees, peaceful, healthy, comfortable, the school at Tourvielle was at once a real home for our men.

The management is entrusted to the high personality of M. Georges Hirschfeld, librarian of the Senate, who is beloved by all those who are in his charge. The men are not without a woman's care. The infirmière-major is a distinguished woman, Mme. Madeleine Monod, related to that great family of Protestant preachers who counted amongst their members the late Adolphe Monod, the beautiful Christian and great man. Mme. Monod is a mother to the wounded men, and no one knows like her how to attend to a wound or defy that arch-enemy of the poilu, which he calls cafard, the "sickness of life" to which he sometimes is a prey.

The founder, M. Edouard Herriot, with all his duties, is often a much honored guest, but M. Hirschfeld and Mme. Monod are the good geniuses of Tourvielle.

There is a billiard-table in the hall when you enter—a gift. There have been many gifts. A mother gave $10,000 in memory of her son; and in the hall, leaning against the wall, there were stretchers which America had sent. But so much is needed, there can never be gifts enough.

On the ground floor are dormitories with every possible comfort and all the privacy which it is possible to give, for those who are most grievously wounded; whilst a wide staircase takes you to those up-stairs where, from large windows, you see meadows and mountains spreading out before you. The washing and bath installation is very good and on the most approved and modern system. The school has grown immensely. Thus the workshops have been transferred from the main building to small detached wooden pavilions bordered by silver bushes and where the potato-beds form the lawn. These pavilions are called "le village."

Where, notwithstanding the men's disabilities, they have been able to take to their old trade, this naturally has been thought the best course. But the apprentices at Tourvielle, boys no longer, but men, learn almost all a new trade.

Shall the Evangelical Churches Unite?

the union of his own church with the Southern Presbyterian body within the next year, and the coming of several minor bodies into the fold.

Mr. George M. Warner brought from the Society of Friends a message of good will and said: "Closer cooperation is necessary. The Friends do not believe the time has come for organic union; but they are ready to join hands with all those who serve Jesus Christ."

Bishop Moench, of the Moravian Church, and Dr. Woelfkin, Baptist, were in hearty accord with the idea of Church Unity. The latter did not think, however, that the majority of the Baptist churches were ripe for a merging of the churches, if that were the purpose of organic union.

Dr. Peter Ainslie, of the Disciples of Christ, said: "A United church is as much a part of the divine program as the death and resurrection of Christ."

Dr. Newman Smythe, Congregationalist, New Haven, said: "The hour of the Church is come; for the Spirit of Christ is the only power which can make our democracy safe for the world."

Dr. Charles H. Erdman, Presbyterian, Princeton, N. J., said: "It will not do to force an external organization upon any denomination. We must be very careful not to offend in this."

Bishop Ethelbert Talbot, Protestant Episcopal, said: "Present methods are a burden to Christianity. People are tired of bickering and wasted effort."

Bishop John W. Hamilton, Methodist Episcopal, pointed to the fact that Bolshevism is spreading in Europe. "Unrest is bound to develop here," he said. "If conditions in this country become similar to those in Europe, a great United Christian Church will be imperative to save the country. We have fragments of such a Church here. Let two or more begin the movement for unity and others will follow." Such a union would save funds enough, he added, to put 50,000 missionaries in foreign fields.

Bishop E. S. Lines, Protestant Episcopal said: "It is a great thing to be here today, and what we have accomplished will bring great results for the Christian Church and for religion."

Rev. Dr. George E. Hunt, Presbyterian, said: "What we have done today will be hailed with joy by laymen from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They will say: 'There is hope for the old Church.'"

Bishop Joseph F. Berry, Methodist Episcopal: "I am profoundly thankful to God that in these resolutions we have really done something toward the fulfillment of those ideals about which we have been talking and praying for twenty-five years."

The Plan for Promoting Organic Union

THESE passages give some idea of what was said at the Conference. It is quite as important to see what was done. The resolutions reported and adopted indicate that the Conference was fully agreed to go forward and prosecute the movement earnestly and energetically. These resolutions, for which Bishop Berry thanked God, provide:

1. For an ad interim committee to carry forward the movement to success.
2. This committee is to develop agencies and methods of discovering and creating interest in organic union among the churches.
3. To present personally or otherwise urgent invitations to the national bodies of the churches to participate in the movement.
4. To present the plan of the proposed Council and the necessary steps for representation in it.
5. To plan for the holding of the Council as early as possible, but not later than 1920.
6. To prepare for the consideration of the Council a plan or plans of organic union.
7. To consider and report upon any legal matters relating to the plan of union.
8. Though the purpose of the Council is to bring about organic union, the committee is not precluded from considering plans for a Federal union, such as that of the States of our country.

Difficulties to Be Overcome

IT WILL be seen that at least two methods of organic union are to be under consideration. One, which means an absolute merging or consolidation of the several denominations under a uniform system of organization, discipline and practice, with the dropping of distinctive denominational names and institutions. This plan presents enormous difficulties. And yet many members of the Conference strongly advocate it as the only satisfactory and efficient sort of union—one which unites at the bottom as well as at the top. It is the only remedy they see for the evils and weaknesses of Protestant divisions in the communities, small and great.

The alternative plan of organic union would allow, it is claimed, diversity of organization and method and discipline, so that denominations like the Baptists, for example, could continue to use their own system and methods of work, and still be a part of the

The Babe in the Manger

THE night is dark, the winds are still,
One star is in the skies;
We follow over field and hill
To where the Babe lies.

There is no glory in the place
Save his who nestles there,
And that sweet light in Mary's face
Whose look is like a prayer.

Two Happy Pastorates

A Plea from Experience for the Gospel Ministry. By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

THIS is the second article of the series by Dr. Clark, the whole series having been announced in the Christian Herald under the title of "Circling the World for Christ." The third contribution, next to appear, will deal with "The Beginnings of Christian Endeavor."

II

I SHOULD like to show by this chapter of reminiscences what a happy and satisfactory life is that of a minister of the Gospel whose heart is in his work. In these latter days the tendency in many quarters is to decry the calling of the ministry. It is not considered the honorable or desirable profession in which our grandfathers and even our fathers rejoiced. It is made the butt of smart magazine writers; its hardships are dwelt upon if not exaggerated by some members of "the cloth" themselves, while the bright and happy side of a minister's life is seldom set forth in its true colors.

It is said, and with truth, that a day laborer who can neither read nor write, can today command larger wages than the average minister who has spent years in obtaining an education. But the true compensations of a minister's life, its intellectual, social and spiritual joys, and the unrivaled opportunities to help and comfort his fellow men, are seldom referred to. Our large colleges, especially in the Eastern states, send very few men to the theological seminaries, and students get little encouragement from presidents or professors. To my certain knowledge, whole generations of students have gone through some of our so-called Christian colleges—colleges founded and endowed in their early years for the sake of recruiting the ranks of the ministry—without the claims of this calling ever being presented.

In one instance I know of, a promising candidate for the ministry was discouraged by his professor of ethics, a renegade clergyman, who told the student not to waste his talents on the pulpit, that he had tried it himself and knew what he was talking about, and that Christianity itself wasn't worth "a hill of beans."

To counteract in any small measure these false and unworthy views of the ministry, I would tell my readers of two happy pastorates which it has been my good fortune to know most about.

I DID not decide to become a minister until near the close of my senior year in Dartmouth College. I had a strong desire to earn my living by journalism, having served a brief apprenticeship as an editor of two college papers, and having earned part of my college expenses by writing for other papers and magazines.

But the wishes of my adopted parents, though never strongly urged; the influence, as I believe, of my mother in heaven, and my own sense of duty prevailed, and I decided to go to the theological seminary at Andover, then under the care of two of America's greatest theologians, Edwards A. Park and Austin Phelps.

I also gratefully record the influence of Dr. Asa D. Smith, president of Dartmouth College, who occasionally talked with me on the subject and once at least prayed with me that I might become a minister of the Lord Jesus Christ. If the presidents of our large and influential colleges in these days followed Dr. Smith's example, the presidents of theological seminaries would not have to bewail so loudly the lack of students.

Just before my graduation at Andover, I was called to the pastorate of the Williston Congregational Church in Portland, Maine. This was a new enterprise, the outgrowth of a mission Sunday school established by the State Street Church of Portland. During the four years' pastorate of my only predecessor, a small but devoted little church of fifty members had been gathered. It worshiped in a wooden chapel that would seat about two hundred and fifty people, and was as devoid of ecclesiastical ornaments and insignia as a barn. A small cabinet organ reinforced the congregational singing, and the service was as bare of ecclesiastical "frills" as the chapel itself.

But the church had that which was better than

Dr. Clark as he appeared in these pastorates stained glass windows and groined arches and surpliced choirs. It had a united, earnest membership of praying Christians, largely young men and women, who had chosen a somewhat forlorn hope because there they found a needier field and greater opportunity for usefulness and self-expression than in the old established churches of the city.

who, like myself, have no unusual gifts—simply a genuine desire to build up the Kingdom and to use in this spiritual architecture such material as they have at hand. There was nothing extraordinary about the personnel of Williston Church or the personality of its pastor. What was done there could be done and has been done in ten thousand other churches, and the same happy, contented, and fairly prosperous life can be enjoyed by ten thousand others.

Every morning I gave religiously to my sermons, though I frequently allowed myself to take Monday morning for my weekly half-holiday. I laboriously wrote my sermons out, gave much time toward the end of the week to familiarizing myself with them, and delivered them from manuscript as effectively as I was able. In later years I cultivated some inconspicuous gifts for extemporaneous speaking. Every afternoon I gave to my parish, calling at least twice a year on every family, and on the poor, the sick, and the shut-ins, of course, much oftener. At first this was a very irksome task, from which I shrank, but, compelling myself to do it at the beginning from a sense of duty, it soon became one of the real joys of my pastorate.

Through such visitation I came not only to know but to sympathize with my people in their sorrows and their woes, and each one became a personal friend. I could have found my way in pitch darkness to every doorstep in my parish, and, though it is more than thirty years since I gave up my last pastorate, a frequent nightmare that visits my dreaming hours is that I have not called on such and such a street for more than a year.

I believe that such heart-to-heart contact with his people constitutes much of a minister's joy in his work. In his study and his sermons he may find intellectual stimulus; among his people he finds the more satisfying happiness that can alone come from genuine friendships and mutual interests.

In Williston Church we made much of the prayer meetings. They never seemed to grow stale or tiresome. From the beginning the church had two a week. On Sunday evenings two or three hundred people filled the vestry. On Tuesday evening, for the midweek meeting, half as many came. When, in the fifth year of my pastorate, the first Christian Endeavor Society was formed, a third weekly meeting was added, especially for the young people, on Friday evening.

SOME of my brethren in the ministry tell me that they cannot sustain a single weekly prayer meeting with any success; but their people must be very different from those whom, with a loving proprietorship, I used to call "my people."

I believe that these prayer meetings, on which I spent much thought and time to insure variety, largely accounted for the growing success and power of Williston Church. They brought the members together week after week—twice and three times a week, in fact—to consult and pray concerning the interests of the Kingdom and their own church and community in particular. The hearts of the people flowed together in these meetings as at no other time. They shared their mutual woes, their mutual burdens bore; and if the sympathizing tear did not often flow, what was better still, they often had occasion to rejoice with one another and thank God for the prosperity of their loved church.

Another cause for the success of the church was the systematic "plan of campaign" carried out every year. At the beginning of the church year in September the pastor planned a series of sermons more or less doctrinal and evangelistic in character that led up to the special prayer meetings held every evening in the Week of Prayer, the first week in

Williston Church, Portland, Maine, where the Christian Endeavor Society was organized

For seven years I was the pastor of this church, which, because of the faithfulness and zeal of its members, grew with astounding rapidity. Within less than two years a commodious and beautiful church was built on a far more eligible site, and dedicated without debt. A net gain each year of more than fifty constantly caused new gratitude to God, unbroken harmony prevailed, and best of all, a gracious revival every year, in connection with the meetings of the Week of Prayer, brought from thirty to fifty people into the Master's service and into the active work of Williston Church.

I tell this story largely for the benefit of young men who are inclined toward the ministry, but

Miss Ladden of Laddensburg

A Christmas
Love Story

By C. COURTENAY SAVAGE

IT WAS cold! A piercing wind swept across the flat country, and every tree and shrub was brittle with ice; for it had rained the night before, and the zero weather had followed.

Miss Emily Ladden, looking out of the window of the station carriage that was carrying her home, drew her furs about her. It was not cold alone that caused the little thrill of discomfort; it was the dreary deserted main street, and the prospect that she, the last of the Laddens of Laddensburg, had been forced to give up the life that interested her, and return to the ancestral home.

She was a tall woman, nearing thirty-five; not beautiful, but possessing a fine expression about her blue-gray eyes, a high forehead, and a firm mouth. Her clothing was rich, her furs had cost a small fortune only a year ago. Yet a sudden turn in the world's financial market and the great income was gone; she must retire to Laddensburg to live on the small estate that was left her, until such times as the ending of the war would allow a reconstruction of the company in which her fortune was invested.

"And they say that the war may last for years," she sighed as the carriage climbed the hill to her own home; and once again she drew the protecting furs still tighter.

The house that Miss Emily, as she was called in the village, value; so—" and she sat forward to get a closer view of the house.

OF THE weeks following Miss Emily's advent at the village where she had been born the less said the better. The village called on her—that is, the more bold members of the village did—but she was not at home to any one. When not bewailing her adversity, she was secretly going over her home and finding how much of it she could tolerate, and how much was distasteful to her. She found that she could afford two women help, as well as the family of the farmer who lived over the barn. She was quite surprised when she learned just how much of a farm it was and that it had more than paid all the taxes and repairs about the house—in fact, yielded such a profit that Emily actually believed she could have the whole four thousand for herself.

The first visitor she received was Kendall Stebbins, and she had sent for him. He was a year or two older than Emily, and before settling down in Laddensburg, where his father lived, he had attempted to practice law in New York. Once he had loved Emily. She wondered amusedly if he still loved her. At any rate, she knew that he made frequent trips as far as Chicago; that he was far more worldly than any of his neighbors, and that he might furnish her with some amusement.

So she wrote that she was sorry not to have seen him when he called and invited him to dinner Sunday night!

SHE found him to be a man who knew the world and was at the same time unworldly. He looked young for thirty-six, she decided; young in spite of the gray hair that flecked his temples. As they sat at either ends of the big table Emily grew brilliant in her conversation, forgetting the depression that had threatened to crush her when she thought of Laddensburg.

"But there is still Christmas," he went on soberly, "and we are trying again to have a community Christmas so that all may share. You may remember we tried it last year."

She raised her eyebrows.

"Of course," she said quickly. "You wrote me and I sent you a check—one hundred dollars, wasn't it?"

The man nodded.

"But there won't be any hundred this year. I need what little I have left."

Again he nodded.

"None of us expect to be very lavish this year"—he still spoke in the sober monotone—"but we can enjoy ourselves. You won't say that you won't serve on the committee?"

"Serve on a committee? Why, what should I do?" she laughed.

"There is plenty to do. What I have been thinking of was that you would be filled with ideas for a different Christmas. You know after all money is not the chief thing in the world."

She looked at him grimly. She had heard similar preachments, but this one cut deep, for it seared her conscience.

"Possibly not," she said sharply; "but it counts for a great deal."

"That is because you have had so much money that there has not been room in your life for the other things which count for more."

She turned quickly in her seat.

"Kendall Stebbins, I did not ask you here so that had come home to inhabit was a great red brick affair, built when the fortunes of the Laddens had risen to great height after the Civil War, but still not the height that they attained thirty years later. It was colonial in design, boasted of seventeen or eighteen rooms, and Emily's father had lived there during his last days; so that it was supplied with all the luxury of light and heat as well as bathrooms.

Had she been frank with herself, and less selfish, Emily Ladden would have considered herself lucky and rich. She still had some four thousand dollars a year and the house and farm at Laddensburg; but she thought only in the terms of the twenty-odd thousand dollars a year that she had commanded ever since her father's death.

"Oh, well," was her spoken thought as the wagon turned in at the big brick gateway, "he said the war would not last five years—which has proved true—and that soon after the war stock would be twice its

After the meal they went to the big living-room, where an open fire threw long shadows on the heavy pieces of mahogany furniture that Emily had assembled.

"Let us sit before the fire"—Emily pushed forward one of the largest easy chairs—"and then tell me all about Laddensburg. Until tonight I have hated the place; now I want to know its history for the past few years."

Kendall smiled.

"There is very little to tell. The corn crops of Illinois have been very good, so as a whole we are prosperous. Some have died, others married, and there have been children. Some people have moved away, others have come. There really isn't much life in Laddensburg. Just at this minute we are getting ready for our usual Christmas tree."

"Oh, yes, it is time for Christmas. Ordinarily I should be madly buying presents; this year, Christmas-poor," and she snapped her fingers.

you might moralize on my past life. I resent your last two remarks."

"I am sorry; I apologize," he said quickly; but there was a hint of laughter in his kindly gray eyes.

KENDALL stayed till after ten o'clock, and they talked more and more of the growing town; then, buttoning his coat of fur tightly about him, he went down the hill to his home.

"I am coming to see you again," he said as they parted. "Coming to officially invite you to head the ladies of the executive committee at the Christmas festival. And I meant to tell you when we were talking a while back that instead of having a 'bought' Christmas we felt we would all turn in and make Christmas for one another, you know—the real community idea."

The "real community idea." Miss Emily was thinking of it as she reached her own room. She

ON EARTH · PEACE and GOOD WILL

By Charles Grant Miller

the political world. His spirit is manifest not in the magnificent surrender of armies and navies, but in the subtle spiritual surrender of our national passions and purposes to His passions and purposes and of our souls to His grace.

There is no more practical truth outstanding from the war than this—that peace which is founded on national greed and international injustice cannot stand, and that a Christlike victory can be complete only in our triumph over our own hard passions and selfish purposes.

There has arisen from among us a leader whose stand for righteousness makes him the commanding figure in the councils of the nations. "To make democracy safe for the world" is his slogan which has inspired us through the war to victory and that must inspire to a healing peace. His endorsement of the proposal for a League of Nations has placed it at the forefront, and a practical, organized combination of all peoples sincerely interested in securing justice, a binding peace, the abolition of war and the guarantee of freedom to the weaker states and races, is being accepted by the public opinion and by the leaders of all countries. It is the practical working out of a spiritual ideal—an adoption at last of Christ's teaching in the supremest affairs of the nations.

tival of all humanity. This universality of celebration of a day originally set apart by those holding a particular religious belief is a unique and profound phenomenon. The reason is not difficult to find.

A poor Child's lowly birth and a Gospel of four words—"peace and good will"—transform for the one day a world of selfishness into a world of altruism. In the practice of the day each looks for the once away from his own interests outward toward his brother's.

Not stopping to think of its religious significance, millions today appropriate the essential Gospel of Christianity proclaimed at the nativity, and millions who reject the theology taught by the churches, celebrate the spirit of the day that saw His birth.

For one day at least, the civilized world is a brotherhood; for the one day at least, a universal commune sentiment is established in which the disparity of conditions among men is obliterated in a common emotion of good will. This is the Christmas spirit that captivates all races, all nations and all creeds and wraps the world in a mantle of light.

There is no other day in the year that means so much. To the young it brings glee, to the aged peace and to all cheer and good feeling. It is a day that, in its spirit and traditions, is distinct and apart from all other days, the one day in which affection and charity rise above the selfish passions of life, the day in which the sentiments instilled by Christ come closest to the surface of human nature.

And herein is hope for the future. The philosophy of optimism can point to Christmas as the most signal proof of the nobler aspirations and the higher possibilities of humanity.

HUMANITY is strangely ignorant of its simplest emotions. In a vague way we realize that real pleasure comes only from a consciousness of doing right, but we are apt to look on this precept as not very practical in everyday affairs. There is no rule of conduct more practical. Charity gives real pleasure any day in the year; so does the right exercise of any other emotion. This is the day when we have this lesson pressed close upon our consciousness. If we would all do on this day, if on no other, what the spirit of Christ and the higher laws of human nature prompt in the matter of unselfishness and charity, we might learn that even want and suffering are not wholly a curse.

It matters not how faultily or triflingly the act of good will may be executed; it matters not that men may soon return to the paths of self-seeking; still hope and faith rejoice in the fact that, for a time at least, an ideal society exists among men during which the common laws of organized communities are idealized, and men seek joy by giving and gain happiness by promoting the well-being of others.

The inequalities of possession on one day at least by voluntary and universal impulse are in a measure redressed by wealth giving from its abundance to poverty, and even by poverty sharing its crust with the poorer still.

Good cheer—good will—good deeds! The world round socializes the better impulses of mankind on this day, and the brotherhood of men that Christ came to teach and to found is, if not fully realized, at least visibly foreshadowed.

THIS is the most glorious Christmas-time since the birth of Christ, because it ushers into the world the greatest drama of all the ages, the applied spirit of the Christmas Gospel of "peace and good will."

Through the travail of terrible war there is being born a world-wide recognition of righteousness as the basis of concord among nations.

The simple Gospel first proclaimed to the little group at Bethlehem has spread until it fills the earth and gains acceptance alike among greatest statesmen and obscurest peoples.

Out of the world conflict, horrible in its base ambitions and hideous in its carnage and suffering, is emerging a shining realization of the highest ideal of civilized mankind.

In the stupendous lesson, the world has learned that force is futile and that love is all-powerful. That nation supreme in military preparedness, efficiently directed and fired by craze for world dominion, has been checked in the tide of its victories, driven back, disheartened, disorganized and crushed by a nation unprepared, inspired by unselfishness and asking no spoils. Men who doubt the power of the spirit of Christ in events of the world must look at this and be confounded.

It is a glorious Christmas-time at which the nations have turned from hate and slaughter to the feeding of their enemies, to the alleviation of want everywhere, to the reconstruction of shattered states, the freeing of subjugated peoples, the rebuilding of destroyed cities and the security of peace, prosperity and progress through freedom and democracy to all.

Over all the earth today the spirit of Christmas fills the hearts of more people than were ever at any time moved by any other emotion.

BUT the triumph at arms by no means renders the victory complete. The war is not over—the thing that is over is simply the military phase of it. The political struggle in which the war was born is just beginning; the spiritual contest toward Christlikeness is never ending. Victory at arms has given into our hands the power and the responsibility for administering world justice; but as we do this in the Christ spirit, or fail, we shall stand or fall. The responsibility is fully upon us, as complete victors, and we cannot shirk it or evade its consequences.

The responsibility of the hour is to see that we do not lose in the Peace Conference the high humanitarian motives upon which our armies have won in the field. The power of Christ is not in armaments, nor is His dominion marked by the changing maps of

THE Brotherhood of Mankind! It was God's decree in the beginning. This was the great truth embodied in the Son He sent to us. It is ever the universal quest. Men seek it under many names, under many organizations and from many motives, and mostly wander far astray. But the yearning remains always; the effort never ceases. All merely human theories and methods have failed again and again. Human reason reels back impotent. But the Word of God stands secure. In it the world will at last find true wisdom. There can be no true conception of brotherhood without also a true conception of fatherhood. The Fatherhood of God is the very fundamental of human love and union that is true and availing.

Slowly the stricken nations are seeking to purge themselves of hate and greed of power, and are groping for just peace, the Eternal will. A mighty task confronts the world in its spiritual and physical reconstruction. It is brought close to us at this Christmas-time that this task can be accomplished only by taking the teaching of Christ and turning to God as the source of all right and justice and peace, for nations as for individuals, and accepting His love and His laws as supreme over all for all time.

It is a glorious Christmas-time at which the Churches themselves are quickened to a realization that in union there is strength, that of closer brotherhood come clarity of purpose and access of zeal and power. Today as at no previous time, Christ's followers throughout the world are setting aside all hindering differences, all hampering divisions, and are joining hearts and hands in Christ's great cause of spiritual readjustment and reconstruction.

Upon Christian unity devolves the duty to bind up the bleeding wounds of the world with the saving Gospel, to support by solid phalanx every step of spiritual advance in international concord, and to build up individual and nation according to the tests of eternity.

THE supreme holiday of Christianity has become the holiday of all creeds and all races. Even sullen unbelief yields to practice what it denies to dogma. Christmas is no longer the exclusive custom of the Church; it has been appropriated as the fes-

The Rising Tide of Christian Unity

THOSE who have been asking themselves whether or not religion would survive the war, are now beginning to realize that not only has it survived, but it has come out of the crucible finer, brighter, and more precious to the souls of men than ever before. It is doubtless the recognition of this great fact that is stirring the churches throughout our land in a movement which points increasingly to unity. How this wonderful movement started, how it has progressed thus far, and what it aims to accomplish are elsewhere set forth in this issue in a very able article from the pen of Rev. H. K. Carroll, LL.D. Dr. Carroll, who conducted the first religious census ever taken in this country, and has been our leading religious statistician for many years, writes with the authority of a full knowledge and close observation of the progress of the movement since its inception.

It was in October, 1917, that the first call to the Christian organizations was sounded in the notable gathering of 500 delegates at Pittsburg, when the need of union was emphasized in a series of addresses by the leaders of different bodies. Then came the action of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in May, 1918, which Dr. Carroll indicates as the first definite phase. Step by step he traces the various stages of development of this great movement, dealing especially with the recent conference in Philadelphia in early December, where fifteen denominations sat together in amity and planned for a national convention in the near future.

Dr. Carroll's whole article shows clearly that the movement toward Church Unity is not only spreading rapidly, but that it is carrying the leaders of the denominations with it, as well as the people. It is now beginning to be realized that no sacrifice is too great to reach the objective of a united Christian Church, in which each denomination will have its part, and where all can work together as one great family for the advancement of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

While to America has fallen the leading part in this great movement, it is already world-wide. The whole race is being born anew. The call for a crusade of Christian evangelism grows more and more insistent. It has been proclaimed at various conferences, in which all of the leading religious bodies have been represented, and it is to be the theme of the coming National Convention. The result of this awakening to the Church's clearer sense of duty and opportunity cannot fail to make for righteousness. It is a time in which every earnest Christian man and woman should pray and work for the success of the movement.

Mighty agencies require time for the process of readjustment; but though their progress may be slow, they are nevertheless sure. If God is calling the nations, as all may believe, his plan and purpose will be disclosed in due time. However difficult it may seem to us now to undertake the work of spiritual readjustment, he will show the way and will find leaders able and ready to carry it through to completion.

Americanization

AT THIS psychological moment in our process of nation-building, the Executive Government and Congress are taking measures to systematize, expand and intensify the work of welding the various strains of our population into a whole that shall give to the world a new race—the American race.

In Congress there are plans for legislation to create a national board of education that shall join the forces of the nation to those of the states in the war against illiteracy and ignorance of American ideals, which has been so shockingly revealed by the statistics of the draft.

Pending the passage of such legislation and as a supplement to legislative plans under way, the Commissioner of Education, Dr. Claxton, is seeking to utilize the machinery of the Liberty Loan Committees in the various Federal districts for the propagation of the gospel of Americanism among the foreign born, and for the obliteration from the map of our country of those dark spots in which foreign sympathies and to a great extent foreign thought and feeling are still maintained.

We should have—and will have—an intensified and broadened Americanization campaign—a campaign that shall banish the old-world point of view, old-world prejudices, old-world rivalries and suspicions and make our foreign-born citizens all-the-way Americans in language, thought, feeling and impulse.

The war and the united effort which it has evoked among the American people have given the strongest impetus to Americanization that we have seen in our history. Fighting under the same flag for the same great cause, all racial strains in the country have been bound together more closely than ever before by the common response to that cause and by the mutual discovery of the innate brotherhood of quality and of courage. Let us not stop short of 100 per cent. Americanism.

India in Famine's Grasp

IT WILL distress many who read the cable dispatches which we print below, to learn that at this Christmas time, when the greater part of the world is rejoicing over the victory of peace, India is facing a serious famine. These are the appeals that have come to the Christian Herald:

"Christian Herald, Bible House, New York:

"Unfavorable conditions large parts India increasing nine months. Private relief must supplement government measures, as in 1900. India urgently appeals Christian Herald. Strong Christian Herald Committee formed Bombay, Hume, Chairman, Parket, Secretary. Send relief promptly. Address Fernstalk, Bombay. HUME."

"Christian Herald, Bible House, New York:

"Famine prevailing. Cable help Christian Alliance, care Coupon, Bombay. FULLER."

We have received a similar appeal from Rev. Mr. Thorne of Aurangabad, urgently calling for relief from famine conditions in that section. Rev. H. T. Voden of Aurangabad writes a letter dated September 28, in which he says: "The grim specter of famine is with us. The rains have almost completely failed in this neighborhood. A little rain has now fallen, but it is certain we shall be in great straits for six months at least and probably more. The price of grain is already as high as it was in the worst famine time of 1899-1900. Many of our people are now actually starving, and all of the three thousand Christians in this mission are in considerable distress. Many of the mission workers can only afford one meal a day. Mr. Butlin, my co-worker, is feeding about one hundred starving Christian people every day while they are trying to find work."

"This famine affects us very seriously in the two orphanages. The children cost us now about Rs. 9 a month each as against Rs. 5 in normal times. As we have to raise practically the whole of the funds through our own efforts we are very sorely put to it to make ends meet, and if we do not soon get extra help many of the children will have to be sent back to their starving families. If you can very kindly help us with a grant toward famine relief work among these poor Christian people, we should be immensely grateful. It is difficult at present to gauge our actual needs, but we shall need Rs. 3,000 at least in Aurangabad."

We know that there are many of our readers who helped India during the last great famine in that country, who would be glad to help her again. Now is their opportunity. At this season of good will and kindly deeds, let us not turn a deaf ear to the appeal which comes so unexpectedly in the midst of our Christmas rejoicings over all the blessings we enjoy. It is an opportunity to emphasize our gratitude by sending a gift to India. The missionaries who have appealed to us we know as among the best workers in that field. They have done splendid service and they deserve all the support we can give them in the present emergency. The Christian Herald, in confident anticipation of the approval and support of its readers, has cabled $5,000 to Mr. Hume, chairman of the Relief Committee at Bombay, with instructions to help the other missionaries who have cabled appeals to us. These workers recall the generous aid received from our readers in the last famine, and they are depending upon us now.

A Christmas gift to the India Famine Fund, care of the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York, will make your own Christmas season all the happier.

A Strange Ambition

ONE of the strangest revelations of the ex-Kaiser's ambition to be regarded as a Prince of the Church has been brought to light recently. When the fortified city of Metz was occupied by the Allies, they discovered in the porch of the great cathedral a statue of Wilhelm, posed and robed as the prophet Daniel. On the wall, slightly higher than the head of the statue, were some significant lines of writing—the words being taken from the letters of fire that startled the wicked Belshazzar and his court. Strangest of all, however, was the discovery that the statue, which had faithfully interpreted the sculptor's conception of the Hebrew prophet, had been beheaded, and that a carved head of the Kaiser himself had been skilfully substituted. Surely the insanity of ambition could go no further than this shocking desecration.

It was not the first occasion, however, in which the mad war-lord had committed sacrilege. British troops found in the German church on the Mount of Olives the long-hidden fresco—the existence of which had been hinted at, though never established until now—showing Wilhelm and his empress seated upon thrones, the monarch being in the garb of a crusader. However, the Metz desecration was the more scandalous of the two.

We hardly think that either of these episodes will be included in the reminiscences which the Kaiser is said to be writing during his exile in Holland.

On January 1 the Christian Herald Advances to $2.50 a Year

WE THINK it only fair that an opportunity be extended to all our readers to arrange for renewal of their subscriptions at the present rate of $2.00 a year before the increase in price goes into effect on January 1. As we have already explained, in common with all other national periodicals, the Christian Herald has been forced to increase its subscription price. Every single item that goes into the making of the Christian Herald—paper, postage, printing, engraving, wages, etc.—has increased enormously. Yet we are resolved that the Christian Herald must keep right on getting better—and bigger—and finer. It has an important mission to perform, and invites the hearty cooperation of every reader that it may do it successfully.

An opportunity is given to all to renew at the present price of $2.00 a year, as the increased price of $2.50 a year will not go into effect until January 1, 1919. No matter when your subscription expires—even if you have recently renewed and your subscription does not expire for many months—you can have it extended at the present rate of $2.00 a year, if you renew by January 1. We cannot accept subscriptions at the old rate if mailed later than December 31.

Several additional innovations have been decided upon since our announcement of December 4. At least four pages will be added to each issue beginning with the new year. Miss Margaret Sangster has gone to Paris, just now the center of world interest, from which her contribution for the next few months will be a most interesting weekly feature you would not care to miss. Then there will be the progress of the Peace Conference, as our special correspondents chronicle it from week to week, the Church Unity movement and the headway it makes, besides a list of other features, all important and attractive, not forgetting a "short story," which will be a regular feature in every issue. If you neglect to renew promptly you will miss much that is both enjoyable and profitable. The moral of which is—Renew Today.

President Wilson on the Bible

IN FUTURE years President Wilson may be as distinguished in literature as in statesmanship. His public addresses since his entry into political life as candidate for the governorship of New Jersey rank very high as specimens of a pure and lofty style of composition. Many of his utterances, written and spoken, since he became President, will, because of his exalted position and the critical times in which they have appeared, become historical and classical.

Probably nothing that has proceeded from his pen or tongue will excel in simple beauty and force of style the short message he sent to be inserted in the New Testaments given to the soldiers by the Scripture Gift Mission. It contains 190 words, 162 of which are words of one syllable, 16 words of two syllables and 12 words of three syllables.

The message is also worthy of special notice because of the method of Bible reading it suggests. "Read," it says, "not little snatches here and there, but long passages that will really be the road to the heart of it." Any one who cares to carry out this injunction will doubtless be secure from the danger of stumbling over the mere "letter," and missing the spirit, "for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." He will also realize how true the closing words of the message are: "When you have read the Bible, you will know that it is the Word of God, because you will have found it the key to your own heart, your own happiness, and your own duty."

Our Margaret Goes "Over There"

FRIENDS of mine, when you read this I'll be in Paris. I'll be in Paris! A Paris crowded with peace and joyousness, and with hearts filled to overflowing, and with American soldiers. When you read this I'll be a living, breathing part of the great brave city—the gladdest city in the world.

Just six days ago our president, Mr. Patterson, called me into his office. I went in, thinking he wanted to see me about some matter of business routine, and found him and Dr. Sandison sitting side by side, talking. They looked up as I opened the door, and I noticed that they were smiling; and that a bit of laughter glanced out at me from their eyes. And as I sat down, across the big desk from them, Mr. Patterson asked me a question that quite took my breath away.

"Miss Sangster," he said in a casual tone, "how would you like to go 'Over There'?"

I looked at him half-dazed. How would I like to go "Over There"? Why, ever since we entered the war there's been a pull at my heartstrings, and a voice in my soul that's been calling—calling! But I could not seem to tell him so.

"You mean—" I stammered.

"I mean," he answered quite as if he were commenting on the weather, "that we'll send you to France—if you want to go."

I was too surprised to speak. I could only stare at Mr. Patterson. After a moment he explained.

"Miss Sangster," he told me, "I have just become president and head of the Christian Herald, and have very wonderful dreams for the future of the Christian Herald—dreams that are going to come true in a very wonderful way. I want to give our readers a new magazine that will combine all the good of the old magazine and many splendid features that the magazine has never touched upon.

"Just at this time the world is emerging from chaos into light. Just at this time marvelous readjustments are taking place. And the center of every readjustment is Europe. And the center of Europe is—France.

"I want to give the readers of the Christian Herald an intimate, illuminating glimpse of this brave country and what it stands for. I want them to feel that they are having real news given to them, and having it before any one else has it. I want them to see people and places in a personal way.

"The sending of you to Europe is a step in the path that the Christian Herald is going to travel this year—and in years to come. Our new policy will be to give our readers the glimpse of everything, before it is given to other readers. And by having some one who knows our paper and our people to represent us 'Over There,' I will be carrying out that policy. So we'll send you to France—if you want to go."

"When will you send me?" It was the only answer that I could manage at the time—"when?"

"As soon," he told me, "as you can get your passport!"

THAT'S how it all came about. And in the week that passed since that little interview in Mr. Patterson's office, I have been getting clothes together,

The picture on the passport and cleaning the work off the top of my desk, and writing letters. And my passport is back from Washington.

It was fun, making out that passport. I had to write down on a long, serious sheet of paper dozens of awfully intimate details about my personal appearance. Any one looking at that passport can see that I am five feet seven and a half inches tall; that I have gray eyes and brown hair; that I have a fair complexion, a straight nose, a round chin, and a medium-sized mouth. It isn't exactly a distinctive description, that, for it might fit nearly any American girl! I had to have a photograph, too, on the passport, and I'm showing you one of them on this page.

It seems hardly possible, as I sit here in my little office and look out over a city that I know and love, that I'm going to France. France is a myth, a romance, a dream! It seems hardly possible that I may see Belgium, the Belgium that saved a world, and London—the London of Shakespeare and of Dickens. It seems hardly possible. And yet it is possible.

Oh, you friends of mine who have sent your sons, I'm going to tell you the story of other mothers who have given their sons. I'm going to tell you what your boys have seen and done! And you of my friends who are sisters and sweethearts, you'll be interested, perhaps, in the other sisters and sweethearts who have suffered and have at last won through suffering. I'll try to get some interviews with big people for the men who will read my letters; but I don't want to forget the people who aren't big—and who, because they aren't big, have perhaps had a closer and more intimate view of the war. I want to tell you what the woman on the park bench thinks, and what the man on the street corner is talking about. I want to see the children of France, and the old people. And I want to tell you about them.

I'VE never been far away from home before. And my French is only of the superficial kind one learns in school. So I reckon that I'll make a good many mistakes—and that some of them will be very laughable. But because you are my friends, I know that when you laugh at me the laughter will be kindly. Because we love each other, I know that you are going to be with me, in spirit, on my whole trip.

I'll not be gone for very long, friends of mine, and so I'm going to ask you, while I am gone, not to write to me. Because the letters can't be forwarded if you do; they'll only lie about unopened, on my desk. When I come back, I'll be so glad to answer anything—and I'll be more than glad to read your sunny little greetings again!

I'm in New York writing this. But when you read it, I'll be in Paris. And about three weeks after you read it, my first article will doubtless be back from Over Seas, and ready for you. And I hope you'll like it.

Oh, friends of mine, I'm going to have a wonderful, marvelous, glorious adventure! And if I can make you feel a little of the thrill that's making me want to laugh and cry and sing from the sheer excitement of it, why—it will be your adventure, too!

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

IT WAS, of course, the flag of the United States, but it was the Christian Herald which was responsible for this particular specimen of Old Glory. It had already played various parts before it received such special honor.

Years ago in America the Christian Herald offered the flag as a prize to new subscribers, and this one came to a little girl whose kind and patriotic aunt sent it to her. Then, by a succession of changes and journeys, the flag came to Italy, and lay for some time folded in a trunk. Those were the days when war had not darkened the horizon.

In the narrow streets of Siena, medieval as though six hundred years had not passed over them, this particular American flag first floated out on the breeze. From a house, which the tenth century had seen in its first building, bright against the dark stone walls, the Stars and Stripes shone out. The evening breeze fluttered them, and every passer-by looked up with interest. It was certainly the only American flag out in Siena on that day. This was the time when our "contrada" had won the "Palio," the historic and picturesque race which has drawn foreigners to Siena for centuries.

Then the flag made little journeys. It went to the beautiful Baths of Lucca one summer, and when the Fourth of July came, it lent its part in the decoration of the hotel dining-room, to the especial joy of a dear old American lady who was staying there.

That was in the year of 1914, the fateful year when wickedness and injustice were let loose, and horror stalked abroad. It was the time when we held our breath with dismay, and our hearts almost failed us as we watched from afar the destruction and ravage which had fallen upon the world. This was not a time for banners and rejoicings; yet the brightness of our colors was not dimmed, only at moments overshadowed by the wings of the double-headed eagle, which flaunted on the banners of the Hapsburgs and the Hohenzollerns. But the Union Jack, the French lilies, the tricolor of Italy were "still there"; and when the right moment came the American eagle was ready too, and sent the Stars and Stripes to wave with the others on the fields of the war-distressed world.

On the day that Mr. Wilson's declaration of war reached us, our American flag went out at once. It attracted attention; little children going by with their fathers and mothers asked what it was, and one child inquired if it was "Turkish," to be promptly scorned by a better informed brother.

But its day of greatest honor was on the 24th of last June—St. John's Day, and the anniversary of two of Italy's battles of the old war, San Martino and Solferino. By a remarkable coincidence, this day was also a time of victory again this year, for the Austrians were driven back and put to rout, in the beginning of their defeat which was now come.

It was a day of magnificent weather, and banners were everywhere. Flags and flowers and tapestries decorated every wall and window. The representatives of Italy's allies had come to give the city their greeting, and all the people turned out to welcome them. A long procession went to the station to receive the guests, and in its ranks the sunlight shone brightly on the Stars and Stripes, borne by a bare-headed Anglo-American boy, as he marched with young soldiers of Italy, old men wearing the faded red shirt of the time of Garibaldi, Americans, Englishmen, French sailors and a company of British blue-jackets, two Highlanders in the kilts, and even a representative of the brave Czechoslovacchi.

Among the banners, this American flag—at that time almost the only one in Siena—waved proudly on. All through the town it went, down one narrow street after another, and out into the beautiful Piazza del Campo, the heart of old Siena. The bands were playing the national anthems, essaying even the intricacies of the "Star Spangled Banner."

Then up into the great Palace of the Commune, into the world-famed hall, the procession passed. There came the banners of Siena, with the wolf of tradition as their distinguishing sign, all the standards of many societies and organizations, and all the flags of the Allies. There was by no means room for the crowd, but all the banners got in, while the people stood out and cheered in the Piazza, and the bands kept on playing. The boy still carried the American flag as he came into the hall, and held it proudly while the different speeches were made. This was its great day; and after the procession was dissolved and the people had dispersed, the flag made itself useful in decorating the balcony of a hotel, and keeping company with an English flag which hung there.

A few nights later, this flag served to drape one of the children who took part in a patriotic representation at the theatre. Then it represented America at a meeting for the refugees from the invaded parts of Italy. It has always made itself of use, this good Christian Herald flag. On the last Independence Day of Italy, September 20th, when the country remembers the liberation of Rome, it came out to wave again.

But it was waiting. Greater things were in store for it. Events were marching fast.

It is the fourth of November. Outside the window it floats. Its English and Italian sisters are near it. All up and down the road, the red, white and green of suffering Italy, of brave, unconquered and triumphant Italy, are waving. The enemy of the centuries is vanquished, and liberty and peace are coming again. The flag which the Christian Herald gave is a little worn now; its stripes and stars are a thought less brilliant; but its traditions and what they stand for are unfaded, and those traditions, those ideals, those hopes, are "marching on."

AFTER NINETEEN CENTURIES A CHRISTMAS PEACE HAS COME!

A Sermon by NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS, D.D.*

TEXT—Luke 2 : 10. "Behold, I bring you tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people."

AFTER long waiting, and intense desire, now comes the world's greatest Christmas. The gracious, hallowed Christmas morn has dawned, bringing such hopes of world peace and such outbreathing joy as never before exalted the souls of men. Men long starved appreciate bread; wanderers dying of thirst value aright the spring, and out of the blackness of the pit and the anguish of four years is born humanity's intense happiness at this Christmas time.

How black the tragedy that has been lying upon our world! Four years of war! Twenty millions of men dead, missing or wounded! Nearly two hundred billions of property destroyed! In France alone three hundred and fifty thousand houses ruined, and over a million people left without roof between their heads and the pitiless rain and snow. At least ten million black-robed widows and several times as many broken-hearted children and orphans! The very sun has been turned into darkness and the moon into blood. The earth has seemed a runaway orb, crashing wildly through space. For years joy was death-stricken, hope waned, dying, while the sun seemed to have passed under a perpetual eclipse.

Good Tidings of Joy

NOW, suddenly, the world has passed from the uttermost of sorrow to the uttermost of joy. It is as if humanity had gone from the blackness of midnight in a moment to the brightness of noonday, with no dawn between them. Already the statesmen of the world are round about the peace table. War itself is dead. Hate, mortally wounded, must die. Gone the era of the torpedo and the bombshell! Gone the poison gas and the dumdund bullet! Gone forever the era of forts and battleships! Never again will Europe be like an armed camp, bristling with bayonets. Never again will the peasant, plowing in the furrow, stagger forward carrying a soldier upon his shoulders. Treaties will henceforth not be scraps of paper. Perished the era of secret diplomacy. Stripped now all the kings of their autocracy. Soldiers breathing out slaughter have lost their swords and daggers. At last has come the United States of Europe, and soon will come the Parliament of Mankind and the United States of the World. Christianity has waited a long time—nineteen centuries—for this world peace. One Name today is above every name; all eyes and thoughts turn toward that Divine Figure whose feet first touched our earth at Bethlehem, the universal Teacher, Saviour and Redeemer, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father and the Prince of Peace.

What This Christmas Means

THIS Christmas comes bringing new meanings as to the unity of the races and the brotherhood of men. God has broken the planet up into five continents and human nature up into five races. He gives to the western continents corn, wheat and cotton. He gives to Africa sugar, cocoa, ivory, gold and diamonds. He gives to one continent the silk and the tea, to the other the indigo, the rubber and the rice, and to each continent its own gift. Not even the United States today is independent. Our people live by the brotherhood of the exchange of grains and products of the temperate zone, in return for the fruits and sweets of the tropics. Not otherwise, God broke up the human soul into five races, the white, the brown, the yellow, the red and the black. He has also broken up the white race into the Teuton, the Tartar, the French, the British and the American. The Italian is artistic, the French has intellectual brilliancy, the British are colonizers, the Americans have individual initiative, the German, patience in detail.

The time was when Germany and France, with England, were over against one another like two castles with cannon shot to the muzzle. The Belgian, with his higher average wealth, despised the German, and the German looked with contempt on little Belgium. This war shows that every race has men who can live and die for their homeland. Struggle has wiped out racial barriers. Men perceive that society cannot hold on its way and progress if the wastes of war and heavy armaments are to be continued. The workmen have rebelled against slaughter. The prosperous perceive that property dissolves in the black flood of war like snowflakes in a river. The result is inevitable. The races have come together; jealousy and hate have been consumed with fiery darts, even as thunderbolts burn the poison out of the August air that is later washed with rains. This war was born of jealousy, greed and the lust of power. When wicked men brought on the storm, a just God did not desert the world, but he walked upon the storm, rode upon the whirlwind and forced evil itself to be overruled and made to do his will. Now war is dead, beyond any hope of resurrection, for the League of Nations has come at last!

The New Era for the English-Speaking Peoples

THIS Christmas brings a new era for the English-speaking peoples. During more than one hundred and fifty years there has been a barrier between Great Britain and the United States. The Revolutionary War was a kind of civil war, the last civil war that has cursed England. That war was brought about by a German king, George the Third. His war upon the American colonies in 1776 was bitterly opposed by the greatest men of England. England's first orator, Edmund Burke, defended the American colonies, as did Pitt and Fox. When the German king wanted a vote of credit to continue the war, Parliament absolutely refused the money, and to this day the German house of Hanover has never been repaid its advances for money spent in the Revolutionary War.

All American histories should be rewritten. If any two empires in the world should stand shoulder to shoulder, those countries are Great Britain (with Ireland, Canada, Australia, India and South Africa) and the United States. Already there are six hundred millions of people in the world that speak the English language. Our language has become the language of commerce, foreign trade and increasingly of diplomacy. For the first time in history, a world conference, like the Peace Conference, is to have as its language the English tongue. For ten years, the great hotels of Switzerland and Italy, of Egypt and Algiers, of India, China and Japan, have hired no waiters who did not speak the English language. It is partly because the English-speaking people are the world travelers and are the richest people in the world, and therefore the best buyers. But the deeper meaning is that the English language has suddenly become the world language, that it is being studied in Tokyo and Peking, Calcutta and Bombay, Petrograd and Constantinople, Rome and Paris, Buenos Aires and Rio Janeiro. This language has turned the whole world into a speaking gallery. People in the uttermost corners of the vast amphitheater understand the political ideals of the free peoples. The language of the old King James Version of the Bible has come into its own. The speech of Bunyan and Shakespeare, of Franklin and Emerson, of Edwards and Lincoln, is becoming a world speech, and the great ideas and ideals that are carried forward upon this language are the Christian ideals of liberty, justice, equality; of service and self-sacrifice. The era of world unity is approaching, and back of that unity stands the Divine Figure at whose name every knee shall bow, of angels in heaven and the races of men on earth.

Christmas and Religious Unity

THIS Christmas brings unwonted joy by reason of the new religious unity among the churches. The supreme test of religion is the test of love. Where love is, God is. When hate comes in the door, love flees out the window. There can be no happiness where love is not, and no peace nor prosperity. It is the office of love to lend meaning to material treasure. Long ago Cicero said: "Love makes gold to shine." Never was there such an opportunity for gold as during the past four years. Call the roll of those who marched not in a triumphal procession, but in a procession of death and heartbreak, where refugees do walk. What homeless creatures these! What rags and what starvation! How ghastly the piles of dead! Gone all the cities and towns! Gone the cathedrals, the colleges, the banks and stores! Gone the woolen mills, the sugar mills, the iron and steel plants! Gone the farmhouses, the vineyards and orchards! But if bad men grew worse, good men grew more Christlike. They poured out money by the hundreds of millions for the Red Cross work, the hospitals, the wounded, the refugees, who needed food and clothing. Protestants and Catholics, Jews and Gentiles, gave their money in a golden stream.

The Hebrew rabbi as a chaplain held the cross before the eyes of a dying Catholic French poilu. On a very stormy Sunday morning, in a great tent in which thousands of soldiers were packed, a Methodist chaplain called the Protestants into one corner, an Episcopalian shouted for men of his faith to come to another corner; the Catholic priest gave directions where his men should assemble, as did a Hebrew rabbi, and finally a Salvation Army man shouted, "All of you who have no church and no name, and don't belong to nobody, follow me over there," and he had the largest crowd of any. Men have forgotten the non-essentials and remembered only the big mother Christian ideas. When the fields are bare in April, the traveler sees nothing but the fences that separate the fields. When the corn grows tall and ripens, the fences are blotted out and only the grain appears. Two million young men at the front have learned charity, tolerance, Christian service and mutual love. The day of Christian Unity is approaching. The separations are going. The barriers are dissolving like icebergs caught in the Gulf Stream. Never was faith in God so strong. Never was the horizon so bright for the Christian religion. The days which our fathers longed to see, and died without seeing, have now drawn near.

The Joy of Christmas

THE last Christmas found the world wrapped in gloom. The children of France and England, Belgium and Russia, had no Christmas. They were too poor to buy presents. All the people, also, were full of sorrow. But now, mark the transformation. The soldiers in Europe have come home. The farmers are back from the front, and have made the house tight against the snows of winter. Once more the shops are open, and the stores gay with bright colors. All over the world the houses are hung with flags. The great halls are open and the people are coming together to talk about liberty and the games of peace. Artists once more are beginning to paint. Architects are planning to build. The woodman is in the forest, lifting his ax upon the trees. Forgetting the perils of the trenches, the miners have returned home, and with joy are lifting the pick upon the carbon treasure. Smoke once more rises from factory chimney that have long been cold.

What reunion of families! What exultations, now that the refugees have come home! It has been long, weary march. Great as have been the losses of the war, perhaps overruled by God, the gains will be vaster still. Today civilization rejoices, and a humanity is glad. For governments have grown more humane, capital has learned brotherhood, business is becoming increasingly cooperative, standing for service. The era of selfishness has quite gone by. Capital itself, long cold, is pulsing with red blood and is becoming sympathetic. Autocracy is gone for ever in Berlin and Petrograd, and polygamy is dead or dying in Turkey.

Multitudes have been redeemed out of the bod with the chill of winter and have found the soul summerland. Today they sleep under the blanket of snow, while their comrades have come home to the Christmas joy. In this hour, when we have cheer for the living and tears for the dead, it is for us to remember that unto God all live, and that this Christmas brings the fallen heroes' entrance into the summerland. It is a time, therefore, of universal rejoicing, for peace hath come to the earth, and good will to men, after nineteen hundred years of waiting. The Golden Age is here, with the beginning of the ideal commonwealth, ushered in by the enthronement of Jesus as the world's King!

Crescent and Cross

NO longer is the Crescent seen

Again the Cross, unconquered, thrills
Judea's consecrated hills.

O little Star of Bethlehem,
Once fateful for the sons of Shem,

Thou mayst now in glory glide
Across the skies at Christmastide.

Broken Pieces of the Ship

SUNDAY, December 29. Acts 27:44. "Some on broken pieces of the ship, . . . they escaped all safe to land." In the very first sermon I ever heard Dr. Joseph Parker preach, when I was a boy, he quoted this passage with extraordinary power. He laid hold of the statement that some were saved by clinging to broken pieces of the ship. They were not saved by a complete boat, but by a plank. And so it may be, he said, in the realm of the soul. Perhaps we are not able to enter, with full believing acceptance, into the entirety of the Apostle's Creed. Well, then, cling with all your heart and mind and strength to an article of the creed and it will land you on the shore!

Our Master was always speaking to his disciples about the mighty power of faith, even though the creed was far from being complete. I do not know how many articles could have been found in the creed of the publican who went up into the temple to pray. But there was one thing he believed: that if his sin and God's mercy could be brought together, the foul waters of his life would be made clean. And in that faith he ventured on his humble cry, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" And the publican went down to his house justified. There is a dark, sin-stricken soul in one of Kingsley's stories who, in the burdensome sense of filthy oppression, goes out into the night crying, "God! God! God!" It was only a broken piece of the ship, but it carried him home. God stretched a hand through the darkness, and the lonely, heavy-laden suppliant could say with the psalmist, "Thy right hand upholdeth me."

Electricity can run through very slender wires. And the energies of saving grace can enter the life through the medium of a very unfinished creed. It is our faith that establishes vital communion, and even though the wire be slender the redeeming power is given. Every heart-ery opens Heaven's gate. We need not wait until we can put an intelligent seal to the Apostle's Creed. Let the soul cry out, "Father!" Let the soul cry out, "Saviour!" Let the weary heart cry for God's bosom, and God's rest shall surely be found. The faith which is exercised will soon be enlarged, for there is nothing which is more rapidly nourished or which more quickly puts on strength than a faith which is lived out in the Lord our God.

The Eternal God Our Guide

MONDAY, December 30. Ps. 43:14. "This God is our God forever and ever; he will be our guide even unto death." God is the greatest fact in the universe. This is true whether we know it or not. It would be true though no man knew it. The fact of God is the underlying and the overshadowing reality of life. This also is true whether we know it or not. Some men know it. Some men never know it. Some men never knew it until they became soldiers and found God in their hour of need. One need not become a soldier in order to be convinced of the reality of God, or, as we may say, in order to find God. Artists have found him. So have artisans. Humble workers at home have found God. Students have found him. Peasants at the plow have found God, and miners in their labor underground.

A mystic said to his friend as they journeyed together, "I know God much better than I know you." True Christian mysticism is the cultivation of the consciousness of friendship with God. We need a guide, and if our guide be a friend, we are all the safer. Some people are satisfied with divine guidance at intervals—in crises of their lives—but since he is the eternal God, we need never be without his guidance. He never grows weary, though we may. Age does not enfeeble him as it enfeebles us. Death does not dismay him as the thought of it often dismays us. He sees through it and knows that death is but an incident in life. So he who is our Guide unto death will be our Guide through death. We shall pass through death as little changed as a ray of light is changed by passing through a transparent vapor. On the other side of the vapor called death we shall have the same Guide that we had on this side of it. "Before us, as behind, is God, and all is well."

The Brief Span of Life

TUESDAY, December 31. I Chron. 29:15. "We are strangers before thee, and sojourners, as were all our fathers: our days on the earth are as a shadow, and there is none abiding." We are completing another year tonight, and it is proper that we remind ourselves of the fact that we are only guests on earth, who will stay here a certain length of time and then hasten away. This earth is like an inn: our arrival and our departure are recorded on the registry, and when we are gone we are soon forgotten. But we shall never forget having been here. This brief span of life that was allotted to us is the period of probation and preparation for us. Because we have here no continuing city, therefore we must seek a better country and an abiding dwelling-place, where we may live forever. Accordingly, let us be ready to depart, that when the call comes summoning us hence we may leave this inn without sorrow and repining, because we know that we lose nothing that is worth keeping by our departure, and we gain an invaluable possession which we could not obtain in any other way than by departing. Let our citizenship be on high, whence we are looking for our Lord Jesus and his angels. With him let our heart and affections be even now, while we are still in the perishable tabernacle of our bodies. With him let us be thoroughly acquainted before we go to be with him forever. As to this world, we shall live in it, be careful to conduct ourselves as decent and honorable guests while we are in it, and improve its conditions as much as we can. But we shall not be of this world. We shall be strangers to the worldly mind and to worldly ways, and we shall not be afraid to let it be known that we wish to differ from all who imagine that this earth and its enjoyments are all that man should strive for. We shall have our mind fixed on the end of our pilgrimage, where we shall meet Jesus face to face and be at home.

"Jerusalem, my happy home,
Name ever dear to me!
When shall my labors have an end
In joy, and peace, and thee?"

Victory Over the World

WEDNESDAY, January 1, 1919. John 16:33. "Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world." To the discouraged disciples, Christ's stupendous claim must have seemed an illusion or an imagination of over-confident hope. The bargain and sale of his Master had been consummated by Judas. The officers and mob were waiting. The cross was on the horizon, the hill of Calvary selected, and the new sepulcher prepared. In view of all these facts, how wonderful that the Messiah should announce his triumphant victory over the world, the flesh and the devil! Failure seemed written all over his career, but this was the human view. The omniscient Christ saw down the ages when the heathen would become his for an inheritance, when the isles would wait for his law, when the cross would draw all men, when the earth would be flooded with glory as the waters cover the sea.

Christ saw that Satan had nothing in him; he was the sinless, spotless Son of the Highest. He had overcome every temptation and was about to shed his precious blood that the crimson sins of humanity might be washed away. He knew that he was preparing the way so that every sinful heart might partake of the transfusion of his own life-blood and be made partakers of his divine nature, transformed into new creatures in Christ Jesus. He knew that his victory on Calvary would be the victory of the world.

We know today that his conquest of the tomb is ours; his ascension is ours; his Holy Spirit's descent at Pentecost is ours. As he overcame, we may become overcomers in him. He gives us his leadership, his power, his life, so that nothing shall separate us from him.

We may have Our Gethsemanes and Calvaries, but "be of good cheer"; in him we will have peace and victory, and we will be satisfied when we awake in his likeness. In the desert, we will find a well; on the hillside, a spring; in the wilderness, a rose, and on the summit of the Delectable Mountains we will find Heaven!

The Full Price

THURSDAY, January 2. I Chron. 21:24. "And king David said to Ornan, Nay; but I will verily buy it for the full price: for I will not take that which is thine for the Lord, nor offer burnt offerings without cost." The story is a simple one. David sought a place to build an altar of sacrifice. The threshing-floor of Ornan seemed to be the best site. Ornan offered it freely, but David insisted upon paying the full price for it. Ornan is a type of the liberal soul, and he was not without his reward. David represents the honest soul—the soul that hates to be a slacker. If this was to be indeed an altar of sacrifice then there was no reason why he should acquire it at a discount. The Lord's house deserves the best and the best always commands the highest price.

The world is full of folks who are fond of driving good bargains. We all take advantage of special sales, discounts, reduced prices. But there is one realm in which the full price must ever be paid for the full results, and that is the realm of character. There may be methods of getting rich quickly—though thousands have lost their all trying to do it—but there are no means of getting wise quickly, or getting pure or patient or holy or strong or noble without paying the full price. The full price of spiritual power is unconditional surrender of the human will to the will of God. "Drive no sharp bargains with God," was the counsel of an old saint. To get the best from Heaven we must give the best, pay the full price.

Apart From the World

FRIDAY, January 3. Rom. 12:2. "Be not conformed to this world; but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is the good and acceptable and perfect will of God." Christ declared to Nicodemus that entrance into the Kingdom of God is by a new birth. "If any man be in Christ," says Paul, "he is a new creature." Christianity is, first, a life. Into the heart of man, dead in trespasses and sins, there enters the power of God, the Word of life, the Gospel of Christ. Godlike thoughts and impulses begin to stir where there was nothing but apathy and deadness toward all things divine. The person has, as it were, been made over again in his inmost being. He knows, too, that he is no longer what he used to be.

Out of this life comes, secondly, a living. The inward change which grace has wrought in a believer's heart is manifested outwardly. The renewing of the mind is followed by a transformation of which the world is made aware.

The Christian lives among worldly men, and has many things in common with them that pertain to his natural life. But he does not follow the fashions and customs of the worldly society around him. His new knowledge of what God wants of him, and his new determination to test the goodness of what God proposes for him to do or to suffer, cause the Christian to differ from worldly men. He finds that he cannot think, speak, act, on given subjects as his non-Christian fellow men do. Very often unpleasant situations arise for the Christian, because of his refusal to co-operate with worldly men in matters where he plainly hears the voice of his heavenly Father calling him to duty. But his refusal on such occasions brings him a great blessing; he is made to understand with increased clearness that it is good to follow God, rather than to run with the world. The ways of God become ways of pleasantness to him, and he pushes forward on this road to the perfect man in Christ.

The Open Door

SATURDAY, January 4. Rev. 3:8. "Behold, I have set before thee an open door." Endless ideals are open to every man, calling for his consecration and endeavor. No enemy can shut the doors of opportunity our Father has built into his household of worlds. Every door seems larger than the last, opening into vistas vaster and richer. Nothing is impossible or impassable with one who is girded by divine strength.

In nature, the scientist is entering open doors of wondrous vision. How much more the Christian sees in the realm of the supernatural! Today, womanhood is passing over the threshold of greater usefulness and activity in larger life. Reformers are also realizing ideals that once were in the dim distance. Governments are anticipating grander achievements than ever before accomplished. Out of the lion-eater of war is coming forth sweetness and light. No human can shut God's open doors. In heathendom, not doors but walls, whole sides, are falling down, inviting missionary effort, educational privileges in the whole Christian civilization.

God reveals to the human mind the secret of the telegraph, the telephone and the wireless, that we may speak to each other as we whisper to him. What a wonderful privilege to enter this gallery of communication and fellowship with the world of mankind! Man is God's pioneer, educated and endowed so he can discover his Maker and the mighty forces of His creation. Let us look for the far spiritual horizon, the possible attainments of man in morals, devotion and heroism, more magical and marvellous than the human mind can picture. Infinite possibilities are waiting our coming, glad to be entered upon, discovered and enjoyed.

All the World

A Story Having for Its Theme the Reconstruction Period After the Great War

CHAPTER NINE

WHAT a gracious, thrilling moment that was when Dr. Ward began to speak to that group of enthusiastic Crusaders of the New Day! The hush of the divine presence fell on all within the house. There was no noisy assertion of what they intended to do. The very air was permeated with forces that held their tongues in silence or bade them say few words. Tears were on the cheeks, voices were subdued, silences eloquent. And when the group dispersed it was in silence, as Dr. Ward, his eyes glistening and his heart sobbing for wonder, bade them good night.

Early Monday morning a long distance call from Bayview came from Chaplain Hunter begging another talk with Dr. Ward. And before noon Hunter was in the familiar study, voice and gesture and thought on fire with the matter that had brought him over. During a part of this famous interview (famous as after history proved it to be), Dick and Esther and Bert Chandler were eager and intensely interested visitors.

"There are so many things I don't know where to begin. But first of all is Bayview itself. Dr. Ward, here in Bradford you have succeeded with a federated church. But I come back home from the war to find seven different denominations in my little town all struggling for an existence.

"Why, I cannot understand all that, after what we have been through! Do you remember, Bert, that day on the Avenue Wilson when we had that Review of the Allies and Ambassador Sharpe leaned over and called out to our Captain Grant and called him by his first name?"

BERT looked over at Dick and both smiled at the memory of that great day.

"Do I?" said Bert. "I thought at first he was addressing me, for my whole name is Berton, like Captain Grant's, you know. And I grabbed my tin hat to take it off and hit Dick, who was at the steering-wheel of the old bus, and almost knocked him off his seat. Oh yes, I remember that day all right."

"But the thing I remember it for, Dr. Ward, was not the astonishing way ambassadors and dignitaries generally let go their dignity on account of our complete victory over Germany, but on account of the astounding make-up of that parade in that review. Never in all the history of man on earth was there seen such a mingling of the different nations. Of course you read the accounts of it. But no description could really make one see that thing as it really was. The ends of the earth were there. The President of the United States for the first time in the history of this country was in another country than his own, the great guest of honor. There on either side of him sat the great ones of the war—King George, Queen Mary, Albert of Belgium, President Poincaré of France, King Immanuel of Italy, the emperor of Japan, the king of Spain and the president of little Portugal, chiefs from the great Indian Empire that gave to Great Britain of every one in that redoubtable company that came over here to us in 1918 wounded and decorated for exceptional gallant service. There came on the Colonial troops from Morocco, Arabs from far stretches of the unknown desert, soldiers from Annam, the French colony of Indo-China with their top-like hats, Anglo-Indian troops that did such wonderful service in Mesopothe native children of that colony of Great Britain, whose ancestors less than a century ago were cannibals, but who now worship in churches where Jesus is loved and honored. And near them the men of Australia and New Zealand who captured all the German possessions in the Pacific and hauled down the German imperial banner and ran up the Union Jack and saw the natives dance for joy to be relieved from the tyranny of the German officers. I see a regiment of Canadians close to them, two crack regiments of Irish near by a company of Boers, Zulus, and from the very interior of Africa a company of Basutu warriors who offered themselves to England and walked three hundred miles to Natal to enlist. And then with all the rest, our own boys from the forty-eight states, boys representing every mingling race of the peoples who have been coming over to be a part of our national life, Norwegians, Swedes, Hollanders, Bulgarians, one whole regiment of American Armenians, Bohemians, Austrians, many Germans, full lovers of America, fighting to free the unborn in Germany from the autocracy they had fled from, Alaskan Aleuts and Siwash, and even one hundred Eskimos, marching side by side with Russian Jews, Cossacks, Tartars, men of Lithuania, Belgium, Serbia, the north of Siberia and one tribe of arrow-blowers under the British flag in the islands of Andaman—where in all the history of the world, Dr. Ward, could such a sight be duplicated?

"And to crown it all with the Christian mark of 'By this sign we conquer,' came the marching hosts of the Y. M. C. A., the Red Cross and the hospital divisions.

"AND my memory stirs again as I see the soldiers from all the nations as they come in the reversal march to pass by these white-clad Red Cross nurses and doctors and these secretaries of the Y. M. C. A. with the modest red triangle on the sleeve.

"They had roared out their national cheers before that unparalleled group of high and mighty ones, kings, presidents and war generals, but when they came in sight of the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A. and hospital corps, every soldier hat came off, cheers died on their lips, sobs choked their throats, tears coursed down their cheeks, men broke their ranks to run over and kiss the hands of tear-glorified faces of nurses and doctors, and the parade really broke up at that point.

"I can remember groups of men on their knees, their hands clasped, their lips murmuring prayers in all languages from the forests of Africa to the mountains of northern India, invoking blessing on the Young Men's Christian Association and the Red Cross, two organizations without a sectarian name, ministering to a world need in the name

JUST A SIGHT O' SANTY

By Margaret E. Sangster

WE HAVEN'T got no chimney, we haven't any tree, It doesn't look like Christmas—as far as we can see; But we have hung our stockings, all empty, on th' wall, In hopes 'at Santy'll see 'em, an' stop, an' make a call!

He may not leave no presents—last year an' year before He didn't come at Christmas, but that was 'cause th' war Had kept him much too busy a-bringin' milk an' bread Ter think o' fillin' stockin's—least that's what mother said.

An' so we don't expect him, but oh, we hope 'at he Will maybe just remember. . . . Fer when there ain't no tree An' when there's not a chimney, why things is pretty bad An' jus' a sight o' Santy would make us awful glad!

her wealthy princes who laid life and fortune down under the folds of the Union Jack, the great military leaders, Foch, the head of all, sitting by our President, General Haig of the British Army, our own Jack Pershing, Marshal Joffre, Marshal Petain, and commanders from all the forces that had combined against the Hun.

"But the thing of all that impressed me as nothing in all the world will ever impress me again, and nothing until I see the redeemed hosts of all nations in the other world, was the sight of the representatives of the earth met together in the name of holy human freedom, creeds forgotten, race prejudice swept aside, the caste of centuries wiped out, all hearts beating to the one tune of earth's coming Brotherhood. We stopped at the Arc de Triomphe and at the new Arc de Verdun and reversed the parade so that the lines went in opposite directions to give the marching divisions a chance to see one another.

"That was the most thrilling sight the eye of man ever witnessed after a war that measured the world's greatest struggle for peace.

"I CAN'T begin to remember all the different races and peoples in that world parade, but here, for instance, came the Senegalese Tirailleurs, black men from the French colony at Senegal. And right behind them a regiment of our own negroes from Georgia, the 310th infantry that did such wonderful work. Then there were the French Alpine Chasseurs, the Blue Devils, tania and Palestine, their snowy turbans moving like white seagulls above the blue of their service uniforms. In the vision of that parade as it flowed by I see the Portuguese troops who stormed into Lens side by side with the Scotch Highlanders, the "Ladies from Hell," who asked to have their Portuguese comrades near them in the parade, and close behind them came a Polish regiment, their long overcoats curiously buttoned back to allow of greater freedom in the march, each soldier distinguished with his crisp black mustache, a decoration not permitted the British Tommy or our own Yanks. I see the troops of little Montenegro, the smallest of the Allied nations, marked for their round service caps and gay insignia. Behind them came the Greeks with their Zouave head-dress with its flowing fez and their snow-white puttees. And no one will forget the men of Italy's crack corps who came swinging along with an Alpine stride, the Bersaglieri, who made the record of the fastest forced marches against the Austrians in the campaign along the Piave. In some miraculous manner which no one has ever been able to explain these sons of Italy manage to secure and wear as the distinguishing badge of their service a plume of cock's feathers, and I never saw one bedraggled or torn or dirty. You would swear a new rooster gave of his best and most lustrous tail feathers every day to each of these men.

"Behind these men of Italy was a company of New Zealand Maoris, of a world Redeemer whose last great prayer was that his disciples might be one.

"And in the face of that stupendous spectacle of that review in France, I come home to my own country and my own people to find in my little town seven denominational bodies living their religious life apart, each struggling to support a minister and maintain a service which is so poorly supported that it has little power to attract and hold men who have seen the brotherhood of men illustrated on the gigantic scale of service where men have not only sung and prayed and eaten together, but where they have died in the same trench and been buried in the same grave where the resurrection can find both, though one was a Christian and the other a Mohammedan.

"Dr. Ward, I cannot settle down to that sort of a life. It would not be life. And I have been looking into the missionary giving of my own church—I mean my own denominational body. And these are some humiliating facts

I have found: In the last year the weekly average gift per member for our great missionary causes was only three and seven-tenths cents; 1,470 churches gave less than one cent a week per member to missionary work. And 964 churches gave nothing except to themselves.

"On top of all that, Dr. Ward, just think of things like these—"

BY THIS time Hunter was on his feet pacing the little study, arms going, eyes blazing, pausing now and then to emphasize his remarks by smiting Dick or Bert on the shoulder as he passed them.

"Think of this! The Fourth Liberty Loan, you remember, was for $6,000,000,000 and the fifth for five more billions. And in between, those consolidated drives of the United War Work Campaign. And the amount asked was not only given but exceeded in every case.

"Compare that with our pitiful sum of $1,321,977 raised last year for the reconstruction of the world. In other words, seven-eighths of our churches fell below five cents a week per member in contributing to a cause which is enlisting right now the best of our manhood and womanhood.

"And the failure is due to sectarianism. Just think of what happened to the Allies before we united under the leadership of General Foch. But from the hour when President Wilson and Lloyd George insisted on concentration and union of forces under one leader, we began to beat German solidarity.

"We shall never win any great victories in this reconstruction drive until we are really a united body as a living church. And I am frank to say, Dr. Ward, that I do not feel like wasting my time and strength over a sectarian effort in Bayview.

"We have made some progress while you have been gone. We have organized our United American Missionary College and we have consolidated some of our sectarian boards," said Dr. Ward, who had listened to Hunter with deepest interest, as had Esther and Bert and Dick.

"I know, I know. I am beginning to find out gradually some of the wonderful things you folks at home did to help win the war. But you cannot blame me for not feeling willing to stay on in Bayview and face an apparently hopeless situation. Oh, we had a wonderful day yesterday. Over one hundred more volunteers came in response to the call. The whole thing is bewildering. But what can we do with all this human material if we don't have the unity of action and the vast financial support to back it up?"

Bert spoke up in his slow, hesitating fashion.

"Chaplain, why don't you go out on a crusade for the union of the Protestant forces of America? Give that little spiel you just gave us about that parade up the Avenue Wilson with a few rhetorical bombs that'll gas the denominations into unity of feeling—"

Pharaoh Oppresses Israel

International Sunday School Lesson for January 5. Ex. 1:1-14

Modern Counterparts of Egyptian Bondage

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THE world still marvels at the giant enterprises of the ancient Egyptians, their mighty temples and pyramids, their colossal statues and tombs. But now that we have come to realize the awful, crushing slavery of millions which made these things possible our admiration is clouded with indignation to think of the pride and arrogance and lack of compassion which characterized the Pharaohs. It is clear that the writers of the Bible felt as keenly as any of us that there was iniquity and folly in such lust of power.

Conditions are marvelously improved today as a rule. Yet there are still injustices and oppressions which excite the wrath of the heavenly Father, and should stir up Christian men to become deliverers of their enslaved brethren. Our mighty industries are more useful than the pyramids of the Pharaohs, yet even now when we see the exploitation of the poor we are oftentimes moved to think that our material progress is costing too much in blood and toil.

The Fall of Slavery

It was only yesterday that actual chattel slavery ceased. It had flourished in all past ages and men believed it permanent. Suddenly public opinion crystallized against it. Christ aroused a love that in the end was sure to wipe out so monstrous a thing. Paul's letters reveal the awakening of a new attitude toward bondmen—they too were brothers!

When you realize the full human brotherhood of the oppressed, when you respect their souls and esteem them as fellow believers in Christ, deliverance must come.

What Industrial Slavery Is

This year all of our churches are studying the problems of modern industry in our Mission Study Courses. The story of Moses confirms us in the belief that God's people ought to be interested in bettering conditions for their brethren who toil in weariness or discontent. There are actually millions of people today who feel that "their lives are made bitter with hard service." Like the ancient Israelites, many workers in factory and field complain of the awful monotony of the task, of the long hours, the scanty pay, the high cost of food and clothing, the poor shelter of tenements and company houses.

Christian statesmen, Christian employers, and Christian labor leaders are seeking for ways of changing these things, that all may have a true opportunity for happiness and growth, at least in this great free republic of ours. Thousands who work every day in the week should be allowed a living wage for six days' work, even as Deuteronomy ordains, "that thy manservant and thy maidservant shall rest as well as thou." Hundreds of thousands should have a shorter work day, for they are stunted of body and mind and soul by their ten, twelve or even longer hours of daily stint. Millions should and will receive a greater share of what they produce. "The husbandman that laboreth must be first partaker of the fruits," according to Scripture.

"Industrial slavery" means labor in modern industry where conditions are bad, or hours too long, or wages insufficient to provide the decencies of family life. If Moses were with us now, undoubtedly he would endorse the effort of the Christian prophets of today to lead their brethren toward freedom and joy in daily work.

"Did the children of Israel, the boys and the girls, have to work and make the bricks without straw?" asked a youngster in Bible class. Yes, they undoubtedly did; for while the expression "children of Israel" means primarily the men and women of the nation, we know that the ancient world abounded in child labor of the most awful kind. Even in the modern Orient child-toilers in multitudes are practically slaves. Our missionaries feel that the drudgery of childhood is one of the worst features of heathenism.

Yet even in our own fortunate land, while child labor is not so general, it exists in certain lines to an astounding degree. Christian philanthropists still strive in vain to do away with this thing. The law against interstate commerce in the products of the toil of children, called by many the National Child Labor Law, has been overthrown by the Supreme Court. Those who want to protect the children have had to begin all over again to find some way of remedying this evil. Is your state one of those that blocks the way? Or is it one that stands firmly for the right of the child to childhood's play and childhood's education and childhood's freedom? The Christlike love of the Christian people will do away with this iniquity ere long. Are you a helper? Jesus said it were better for a man that a great millstone were hanged about his neck and for him to be cast into the sea than to sin against one of his little ones. Do you think it is right for a man to grow rich out of the labor of scores of children?

The Hebrew immigrants found Egypt a land rich in corn, but somehow a land of slavery, too. It has always been a hard thing to try to fit into the life of a new country in the days of its prosperity. Long ago it was written, however, that "the Lord thy God loveth the immigrant; therefore love thou the immigrant." It is said by students that Israel was always hospitable to immigration. Certainly our country has always kept a wide-open door. Yet many of the "strangers within our gates" have found the promised land a land of heavy burdens and grievous to be borne. Disheartening indeed are the tales of experience in city slum or desolate mining camp. Large numbers live under very debasing conditions in the wealthy and generous United States of America. What a sad saying was that of a Russian immigrant to a home missionary in one of our squalid industrial settlements: "We drink, drink, drink, when we meet together, for that is the only form of amusement we know!"

America's melting-pot has felt a new and fervent heat in the past mighty effort for world freedom. New unity, new loyalty, new interest in true patriotism has resulted. Shall we let the melting-pot cool off again? Or shall we rather keep it warm with the ministries of Christian love and American fair play until it makes of us one great free Christian democracy, without a drunkard or a slave?

The Challenge to Christian America

Egypt could not keep the chosen people because she would not treat them rightly. The book of Exodus is a charter showing us that God cares, that religion is concerned with toil, that the Church has a sphere in bettering the lot of the oppressed. The aggrandizement of militarism is checked. Enslaved Belgians and Poles have been delivered by the free nations. Now throughout the whole world we turn to the huge task of freeing all peoples from conditions that cramp and kill. God bless and help his world in its difficult task, that the Christian spirit may avail to settle these hard problems of the world's work without bitter strife. Let Christian America, so fortunate, so rich, lead the way.

REV. ROBERT SPENCER

The City Hall where seven churches united to bring Christ to their community

A Community Christmas Tree in Japan

THE Christmas of 1917 was celebrated in the city of Fukuoka, Japan, in a way that will not soon be forgotten. With a desire to bring the message of the Christ Child to the people outside the churches, the idea of the Western Community Christmas tree was adopted and the seven Protestant Evangelical churches united, in the effort with a vigor of interest that will prove in the future a boon to local Christian fellowship. The City Hall is the center of the city life, and it was decided to hire this hall, thus giving also the appearance of official sanction. The church people were urged to spread the news, with the idea that this was to be a celebration not so much for Christians as for the man who might find Christ on this Christmas night.

The grounds around the City Hall were early filled with people and by seven o'clock the hall was packed. Hundreds of late comers could only flatten their faces against the windows or, unable to stand the cold, get a far glimpse of the fascinating Christmas tree and turn their disappointed way homeward.

The Christmas tree in one corner towered to the high ceiling, festooned and garlanded, and lighted with tiny electric lights. No gifts burdened its branches, for this was to be not a material tree but a tree from whose branches "silently the wondrous gift is given." The program was planned to amuse and instruct, and the sweetness and naiveté of the children who performed won all hearts. At the end of the program came a Christmas cantata, and the big audience sat spellbound as the story of the shepherds and the wise men, of Mary and the Christ Child unfolded before them. After this, one of the pastors of the city gave a short interpretation of Christ and Christianity, and made an appeal to all to become believers.

All Paris Cheers for Wilson

BETWEEN two rows of Poilus, behind whom the people of Paris were gathered 2,000,000 strong, filling streets to the house lines, overflowing from windows and outlining the roofs, President Wilson entered Paris on December 14. He was received with the music of reechoing cheers, while guns boomed the Presidential salute. Paris poured out to him, as the representative of America, the full vial of her gratitude for what America had done since April, 1917. Mr. Wilson's train reached the Bois de Boulogne station at 10 A. M. President Poincaré was awaiting him, and fifteen minutes later the presidents of the two Republics left the station in a carriage, passing through the lines of cheering people along the Champs Elysees to the palace of Prince Murat, where Mr. and Mrs. Wilson will live while in Paris. Mrs. Wilson and Madame Poincaré were in the second carriage. A dozen other carriages followed bearing Premier Clémenceau, Ambassador Sharpe, General Pershing, General Bliss, Secretary Lansing, M. Pichon, French Foreign Minister and other civil and military dignitaries. At one place a young woman dressed in Alsatian costume broke through the lines of guards and threw a wreath of roses into the President's carriage. A group of school boys threw violets into the carriage occupied by the wives of the two Presidents. Correspondents described the tribute given to Mr. Wilson as the most hearty and unrestrained given to any statesman in France during the war. The day was made a fête day and the crowds sang and danced and paraded, exceeding the record of armistice night.

At noon President Poincaré entertained President Wilson at luncheon. In addressing Mr. Wilson as the guest of France, M. Poincaré declared: "Mr. President, Paris and France awaited you with impatience, they were eager to acclaim in you the illustrious democrat whose words and deeds were inspired by exalted thought. . . . The eminent statesman who had found a way to express the highest political and moral truths in formulas which bear the stamp of immortality."

President Poincaré expressed the appreciation of France for the work of relief done by Americans before the United States entered the war and paid an eloquent tribute to the United States, General Pershing and the American army, which he said brought with them the enthusiasm of crusaders leaving for the Holy Land. He declared that the guilty in this war must not remain unpunished, and that "We must introduce into the peace we are going to build, all the conditions of justice and all the safeguards of civilization that we can embody in it."

President Wilson in replying expressed his debt to President Poincaré for his gracious greeting and declared that "From the first, the thought of the people of the United States turned toward something more than the winning of this war. It turned to the establishment of eternal principles of right and justice." He said also that the American soldiers in their ardor and enthusiasm had expressed the true spirit of America. Regarding the final settlement of the issues of the war Mr. Wilson said, "I appreciate, as you do, sir, the necessity of such action in the final settlement of the issues of the war as will not only rebuke such acts of terror and spoliation, but make man everywhere aware that they cannot be ventured upon without the certainty of just punishment."

Later in the day President Wilson received a delegation of French Socialists and in response to their address he declared, "It is not possible to secure the happiness and prosperity of the world, to establish an enduring peace, unless the repetition of such wrongs is rendered impossible." He declared in his judgment that this could only be made certain through a League of Nations.

of welcome to which the President made a brief reply. The Presidential party left Brest for Paris about 4 P. M., but Brest, having received the first American President who ever set foot on foreign soil gave itself over to two days of merrymaking.

President Wilson attended church twice on Sunday, December 15, going to the American Presbyterian church in the morning and to the Episcopal Church of the Holy Trinity in the afternoon. After the morning service he went to the tomb of Lafayette on which he laid a wreath. During the day the President and Mrs. Wilson called on President and Madame Poincaré at the Elysee Palace, and the President received Premier Clémenceau and held conferences with Colonel House and with Herbert Hoover.

It was announced that the first meeting of the Peace Congress would probably be held after January 1 and that the intervening time would be used by Mr. Wilson in conferences with the Premiers and heads of the Allied Governments and in visiting the battlefields. It was reported that the President give opportunity to develop the wisdom of government control.

FLEET HOME FOR CHRISTMAS. Washington announced on December 13 that the battleship fleets commanded by Rear Admirals Hugh Rodman and Thos. S. Rogers would return to America about December 23.

NATION MAY PURCHASE CABLES. A Bill was introduced into the House on December 13 to extend the time of Federal control of the Telegraph and Telephone systems until they could be appraised by the United States to be run in connection with the Post Office Department. Mr. Burleson, on December 15, established new long distance telephone tolls based on 6¼ mills a mile and providing for reduced rates at night.

BERLIN WELCOMES "VICTORS" HOME. The Prussian Guard entered Berlin on December 10, being received by the population of the capital as conquering heroes. Herr Ebert, acting head of the revolutionary government congratulated the troops that no enemy had defeated them. The apparent tendency of the returned soldiers to support conservative measures proved at least a temporary check to the Bolshevist radicals. None of the Allied armies reported any trouble in maintaining order in the occupied portions of Germany. On December 13 the American armies had reached the west bank of the Rhine along the entire sector assigned to them and were preparing to occupy the 30 mile semicircular bridgehead opposite Coblenz. The American and Allied troops had fully occupied all the bridgehead positions on December 14 and the armistice was extended to January 17.

The battleship Pennsylvania, his flagship, and Admiral Henry T. Mayo, under whose command the President sailed safely to France

The President's ship was met outside Brest by the battleship squadrons which have been working abroad during the war. Admiral Sims' flagship, the battleship Wyoming, and Admiral Mayo's flagship, the battleship Pennsylvania, led two long lines of battleships with destroyers and other craft which flanked the George Washington and surrounded her all the way to the straits leading to the harbor of Brest. As soon as the fleet was sighted the guns began to boom their sonorous salute. The ship anchored about noon and was immediately boarded by Colonel House, and General Bliss, Ambassador Sharpe and General Pershing and officials of the French Government. The President went ashore in a harbor boat a little after 3 o'clock. As he and Mrs. Wilson stepped on the pier they were welcomed with cheers. The Mayor of Brest read a formal address would go to the front at Christmas to eat Christmas dinner with the army.

Glimpses of the World's News

TO FIGHT THE PLAGUE. The Rockefeller Foundation will return in 1919 to the war on disease. Major Gen. Gorgas will head an expedition of scientists to Central and South America to make war on yellow fever. The campaign also includes the elimination of the Asiatic plague in China and Asia.

5 YEARS FOR RAILROADS. William G. McAdoo as Director General of railroads recommended, on December 10, that the time for the final return of the railroads to their owners should be placed 5 years from January 1, 1919, giving as his reason that it was necessary to spend $300,000,000 a year on improvements, and also that that time would FREEDOM COMMERCE. The War Trade Board announced on December 13 that almost unlimited shipments of commodities would from that day be permitted to our Allies, their colonies and neutral nations.

PORTUGAL'S PRESIDENT KILLED. Dr. Sidonia Paes, President of Portugal by virtue of revolution since December, 1917, and by election since June 9, was shot and killed by an assassin in the railway station at Lisbon on December 15. The crowd seized and killed his assailant.

THE KAISER'S FUTURE. A correspondent of the New York Times declared, on December 11, that he had excellent information that the present government of Germany would not oppose the handing over of Wilhelm II by Holland to the Allies. The government of Holland was also reported as willing to discuss the question. Dispatches of December 13 pictured the interned Crown Prince as running away from a mob of Amsterdam women who invaded his island retreat.

TWO ON ONE WIRE. Postmaster Gen. Burleson, December 2, announced that it has now become possible to use a single pair of wires for both long distance telephone and telegraph service. A single circuit may be used for 5 telephone conversations simultaneously, or for 40 telegraph messages at the same time, or a combination of the two services may be worked out.

We Begin the Search

RUTH McDONALD will greet the Christian Herald Family next week in the opening chapters of Mrs. Lutz's new serial, "The Search." Incidentally there are a couple of young lieutenants who are no particular credit to a uniform which is worn by better men. The plot is as thick as can be right at the beginning.

Dr. Jowett begins a new year in next week's issue. He takes "The Materialistic Vision" and widens it, with a spiritual horizon, under which he finds the basic truths of church unity.

Next week, too, the first pictures of the German revolution.

The publisher, the bookman and the circulation man, aided and abetted by the editors, have something to say next week. They take four pages to say it in, so you may know it is not only important but mighty interesting.

Marion Harland's Corner

From Our Winter Letter-Box

AS WILL be seen by perusal of the several letters that make up the pith and heart of our talk today, our members are awake to the requirements of the season, and mindful of the stern and abiding necessity of judicious economy.

It is a significant fact, patent to all observers of social life, that nobody nowadays apologizes for setting plain fare before guests. Notable housewives vie with one another in bringing forth new and attractive combinations of inexpensive materials. And interfusing the generous rivalry is the spirit of true patriotism which, like a divine animus, inspires all classes in this wonderful age of ours.

Another pleasing fact is brought to light by our letters: The Corner is read carefully by members, and it has engendered kindly and sisterly impulses throughout our great family.

Proof of this blessed holiday temper will be evident from what follows:

"Ever since I saw the directions for using bricks for keeping food warm I've wanted to tell you of a much simpler method. Envelop your food kettle or coffeepot, or whatever vessel you use, in two or three thicknesses of newspaper, and your food will keep absolutely hot and finish cooking for an hour at best. I've often finished cooking potatoes, apple-sauce or indeed anything, and it is perfect. My daughter promised to roast a leg of mutton for her neighbor, but entirely forgot it until her own turkey was two-thirds done, when she took it from the oven and wrapped it in newspapers, and at noon it was perfectly cooked throughout.

"I want also to give a recipe for a nice pudding—very simple and cheap:

"Four tablespoonfuls of rice; one quart of milk; teaspoonful of salt. Sweeten to taste. Cook in a slow oven for two hours. It is creamy and delicious.

"I am thoroughly enjoying the Corner."—Mrs. W. (California).

Your inexpensive application of the principle that has given us the "thermos bottle" and the fireless cooker should be caught at eagerly by those who feel keenly the absolute necessity of hoarding heat for cooking purposes. Anything that saves so much as a pound of coal is better worth adopting now than ever before in the history of American housewifery. The newspapers must be folded closely about the boiling vessel without a moment's delay, and bound in place. There must be at least four or more thicknesses of paper. One woman who has practiced this manner of cooking food for years adds an old blanket, folded tightly, to the papers, and sets the compact bundle away in a warm corner of the kitchen-closet until she is ready to serve the meats or stews enclosed. She makes capital soups in this way, and keeps porridge hot all night.

Thank you for kind words for the Corner.

"My heart was touched by the inquiry of 'M. E. V.' (New York) requesting cookies that our boys in camp can eat with a relish, and that are as good when received as when first baked. Having a son of my own in the officers' camp, and knowing just what these boys of ours like, I hasten to send a recipe which has often been sampled by them and proved good. Age has no effect on them. They may be kept a year or longer—if hid where the youngsters can't find them.

Nut Cookies

"One cup ground nuts of any kind; one cup chopped raisins (may be ground with nuts); two and one-half cups of sugar; one cup butter; three eggs; one-quarter cup cold water (in which dissolve one-half teaspoon soda); one teaspoon nutmeg; one teaspoon cinnamon, and flour enough to roll out.

"Corn, rice and oatmeal flours are good substitutes for flour in the recipe."—Mrs. P. H. M. (Illinois).

It is too late to send Christmas boxes overseas, but there are thousands of boys in American camps who would enjoy a box of such cookies as you tell us of. I can well believe that they will not keep long unless hidden from the youngsters at home. Forty years ago, I published a recipe for ginger-snaps "warranted to keep if locked up!"

"Having seen an admonition in the Corner to housewives to keep a lookout for the white scum that rises upon the top of pickles, I think a remedy may be helpful to my fellow pickle-makers which I have used for years with success.

"Wash and scrape horseradish root clean, cut it into thin slices and scatter it over the top of the pickles. Allow only a few pieces to each jar, and leave it upon the surface of the vinegar. It is an effectual preventive of the evil of rising scum which spoils the looks of the pickles and lends a musty flavor to them also."—M. W. (Maine).

One of the useful practical hints that should be handed over for the general good by her who is lucky enough to know of it. The preventive is as simple as one for which I have been grateful for twenty years—namely, how to kill the odor of boiling cabbage and cauliflower by laying a slice of stale bread upon the surface of the water in which it is cooking and leaving it there until the vegetable is done. Another priceless hint along the same line may not be amiss here: Always cook onions and all members of the malodorous cabbage family in open pots.

"Now that we are thinking of holiday goodies, may I pass on to sister Cornerites a recipe for Irish potato pie which some of us prefer to sweet potato pie?

Irish Potato Pie

"Boil, and mash while hot, enough potatoes to make two cupfuls when all are mashed and beaten to a cream with a tablespoonful of butter (or a substitute) and half a cupful of milk. Beat into the creamy mixture, when it is cool, the yolks of two eggs already whipped light, and scant cupful of sugar. Season with cinnamon and mace to taste. Lastly, stir in the whites of the eggs beaten to a standing froth. Bake in an open crust.

"When sugar is scarce, I sweeten with karo or other syrup. In which case I wet up a teaspoonful of corn starch with the milk to make the potato mixture of the right consistency. Liquid sweets thin cake batter and other mixtures. A little corn starch sets all right. Before I learned this 'trick,' my gingerbread and batter puddings were woefully flat. So I pass it along."—Mrs. S. A. G. (New Jersey).

Your suggestion about the corn starch is timely. Other housewives have lamented the "fall in stocks" consequent upon the substitution of free syrups for sugar. Corn starch stiffens the compound, without affecting the taste of cake or pudding or custard.

While agreeing with you that Irish potato pudding is even more toothsome than that made of sweet potatoes, it is not to be denied that the latter is delicious if made according to this recipe:

Sweet Potato Pie—Old Virginia Recipe

Parboil, peel, and, when they are cold, grate enough sweet potatoes to fill a coffee-cup (large). Rub to a cream a tablespoonful of butter with three-quarters of a cupful of sugar, and the beaten yolks of two eggs. Spice to taste with cinnamon and mace, and beat in the grated potato, adding, as you go on, the juice of half a lemon. Lastly, stir in lightly the stiffened whites and bake at once in an open crust.

Sweet Potato Pudding

Make as directed above, and bake, covered, in a greased bake-dish until it is firm. Then brown lightly. Eat cold with cheese. It keeps well.

Know What Energy You Get

The Government standard for measuring foods is the calory.

We measure food needs by calories. The average man needs 3,000 calories daily. The average woman needs 2,500.

This is what some common foods yield in calories per pound:

Calories Per Pound

Quaker Oats	1810
Round Steak	890
Leg of Lamb	860
Salt Codfish	325
Perch	275
Oysters	225
Canned Peas	235
Potatoes	295

Comparing cost on the calory basis you find this:

The average cost of meats and fish at this writing is ten times Quaker Oats.

The average mixed diet costs five times Quaker Oats.

Yet Quaker Oats is much the greatest of these foods. It is almost a complete food—almost the ideal diet. Foods which cost ten times as much cannot compare with oats.

This Costs 5c Per 1000 Calories

This Costs 57c Per 1000 Calories

This Costs 54c Per 1000 Calories

This Costs 60c Per 1000 Calories

imagined that there were plenty of people more able to do the required work than she; yet the Laddens had always been leaders in the community, and she was the only living Ladden. She went to the small desk beside her bed and from a drawer drew out her check book. She studied the figures carefully, but they seemed appallingly small. No; she could not afford a Community Christmas, much as she would have liked to give the town—something to talk over. Then she remembered that Kendall had said each one was to help. Oh well, she would do her share, probably making foolish little paper chains such as they did in the kindergartens. She threw the check book back in its drawer, shut the desk, and, snapping on a light that flooded the big chair before her bed, picked up the novel that she had been reading that afternoon.

IT WAS several days before she saw Kendall Stebbins again, and then they met in the post office. A heavy fall of snow had broken the intense cold, and as soon as the sidewalks were cleared Emily decided that she would explore the town. The sun had been brilliant all morning, though not warm enough to melt the snow and make walking difficult. On the Hill, Ladden's Hill, the children were coasting, and sleighbells were everywhere.

She had quite enjoyed her walk; it was in the nature of a revelation to her, for there were houses and streets she had never seen before—a new school-house, repainted buildings, and a business block of stone.

"Why, Laddensburg has grown to be quite a town," she told Kendall by way of greeting. "I went out for half an hour and have been gone two."

Kendall assured her that the place had the making of a city. As he talked he noted with approval the glow of her cheeks, the clearness of her large eyes. Surely the afternoon had done her good.

"A city? What would make poor little sleepy Laddensburg a city?"

"Several things. We have very good water facilities, and I am inclined to believe that if we could get a manufacturer to come in here with some industry the place could be made prominent. You know we are naturally situated to make Laddensburg a center."

She did not know it, and frankly said so.

"Then, too, the country outside the town had been found very fertile for corn, and the farmers are coming in here to do their shipping, and incidentally their shopping. Also, there's a project to operate a coal mine at Warren—it's only twelve miles by trolley—and we are the nearest town of any age or size."

"How faithful you are to Laddensburg!" she said, and there was a tinge of sarcasm in her voice.

"Yes, I feel that some of the old settlers of the place must be faithful," and Emily knew that the thrust was well deserved.

"Quits! quits!" she cried; "and to show you that I've no hard feeling I'll ask you to walk up home with me, and I'll give you afternoon tea."

Kendall laughed. Afternoon tea was not a custom in Laddensburg. But he accepted the invitation to walk.

IT WAS while his afternoon tea was getting cold, and while he neglected a generous slice of chocolate cake, that he told her of the Christmas plans and invited her cooperation and advice.

Miss Emily was feeling better mentally. The resentment that had filled her two weeks before was going, and her walk of the afternoon had awakened her interest.

"And you mean that some of these people would have no Christmas if it were not for interests outside of their homes?"

"Exactly. Remember that foodstuffs are high, some of the bread-winners have gone to training camps, and Christmas is a luxury."

"Oh!"

"Then, too, there is one phase that has to be considered. Many of the people would not accept a Christmas sent in to them—it would be receiving charity. If they are allowed to help, that will make it different."

Emily nodded. She was beginning to understand.

"And you feel that I can be of service to your organization. Well, Kendall, I'll help; though I don't know what I can do."

"You'll help; that's all I wanted to hear. The what-you-can-do part will come later. Christmas will be in two weeks; tomorrow we will have our first committee meeting, and plans will be discussed. Will you be there?"

"Yes."

"Good. Then all this tea has not been wasted in vain. Now I must run back to my office. There is such a thing as signing mail, you know," and he made a hurried departure.

THE committee meeting was a success—at least so it was generally said, even though Miss Emily sat back in one corner and smiled at the method of procedure. The general committee had been elected from all parts of the town, and the ideas of a Christmas were many and decidedly varied, from those who believed that the day should have nothing but a religious aspect to those who regarded it as something more festive than the Fourth of July and Thanksgiving rolled into one.

It was decided, however, that the festivities were to be held in the new gymnasium at the high school; that there must be a tree; that there would be exercises by the children; that there would be dancing, and that there would be plenty of refreshments. The matter of presents was discussed, but not decided upon. Several argued that presents for every child under fourteen could be bought for very little money, and this statement was to be investigated by a committee whose duty it would be to look over two or three mail-order catalogues.

"Now we've all got to work quickly," Kendall told them at parting, "and whenever you strike a snag come to me, or to some member of the executive committee." Kendall was head of this executive committee; rightly so, for he would have most of the work to do. The other members were two of the ministers—two teachers famed for their energy and skill at such times—and Miss Emily. Kendall had placed her on the committee with himself, half fearing that if he gave her other work to do she would prove inefficient.

HE LEARNED differently when three days later he heard that she had invited all of the girls of the senior class at the high school to spend the afternoon with her and "make something." What this "something" was no one but Miss Emily and the head of the decoration committee knew. Two days later he heard that she had been at the kindergarten all morning, and that the girls were again in session at the big house on the hill. When he thought it was the first time in twenty years that the big house had been opened to the people of Laddensburg, he smiled knowingly, and realized that the last of the Laddens was taking her true place in the community.

It was not until later in the week, however, that he met Miss Emily. It was just outside of Ware's, Laddensburg's only pretense at a department store, and her arms were filled with packages.

"My, but I am hearing such glowing reports of your work!" he complimented her.

"Yes? Well, I'll confess that if any one thinks my work is glowing it pleases me. Personally, I never realized before what good manners young American girls have. My efforts with a needle were truly humorous, and they did not laugh. Oh, Kendall! I never knew there were so many things to learn."

"Then this Christmas is not going to be such a calamity after all?"

"Calamity?" She sent one swift glance in his direction. "Yes, it's calamity enough; but, then, I hope I'll be able to work myself over it."

"You mean the work with your fingers will help you?"

"Yes; it can help anybody back to normal if they work hard enough, and know enough to work at."

"Oh, well, Miss Emily, you'll soon forget all the days that used to be. Just wait a while."

"Don't, don't! I don't want to forget. I'm trying to make the best of this situation, only until I have my money again. Then I can get away. And now I've got to run."

Kendall offered to carry her packages but she refused, and hurried away. He watched her go, quite the most pretentious figure in the street, for her bearing had a peculiar dignity, and her costly city-made clothes were notable against the cheaper cut and material of the clothes of the women she passed.

As he climbed the stairs leading to his office he was still thinking of her, and wondering if she really would want to go away, or if she would not gradually come to realize that there was contentment in Laddensburg. Contentment. . . . He pushed the thought from his mind, even though he could not repress the smile that played about his lips. On the way through his outer office he glanced guiltily at his own reflection in the mirror. He was rather a handsome chap—not at all bad looking!

THE days that followed passed quickly, and it was only three days before Christmas. Kendall had given up any pretense at his own work further than answering letters, and was everywhere about the town. Miss Emily was quite busy. When she thought of the various festivities she had worked for and attended back in the East and on the continent of Europe, she laughed at the simplicity of this community Christmas. Yet she was as earnestly interested in the cooking that was going on in the big kitchens of the Methodist Church rooms as she had been in a menu at a Biltmore festa. The decorations she had helped to make, and which she had paid for out of her own pocket, were of as much consequence as if they had been smilax from Louisiana and twining roses worth a small fortune. She was truly concerned at the report that the committee in charge decided against the purchase of toys for the younger children—and went again to her check book. Emily Ladden's heart had not been touched, however; she felt that every dollar would be needed, for she must wear fine clothing, and there would have to be trips away from the growing Illinois town.

Still she kept busy, and though she would not admit it, she was happier than she had been for years. The spirit of doing for others was gradually commanding her, and banishing her constant thoughts of self.

It was toward six o'clock at the end of her busiest day when she climbed the hill toward home. She might have ridden in a station hack, but she enjoyed the walk after the long afternoon indoors, when she had helped with her decorations. At her own gateway she stopped and looked back over the town. She drew great breaths of the sharp air. After all, Laddensburg was largely hers, and this day she had given the town much to talk of. She was still thrilling with pride at the exclamations that had greeted her decorations, for she had covered the gymnasium walls with broad strips of red bunting on which great Christmas trees had been sewed, and blue bunting with gold and silver stars hung loosely across the ceiling. Then, too, her stage picture of Christmas trees decked with cotton snow was a novelty. Tomorrow she would show them the effect it gave when the entertainers came wandering through the trees to the front of the stage.

She turned and walked briskly into the house.

"I'm home," she called to the maid who was setting her solitary place in the great dining-room. "Any mail at noon? I didn't wait to see."

"Yes, ma'am. It's on the desk upstairs; and some packages are on the floor."

She hurried up the stairs, but waited till she had removed her hat and coat before sorting her mail. It was the third letter, as she remembered it afterward, and her first thought was resentment that it should have been lying there all afternoon and she did not know. She read it hurriedly, a second time, and then sat on the edge of the bed to read it again. Suddenly the import of it dawned over her. She paced the room a dozen times, and suddenly reentered herself to read the letter again. It was a lengthy letter, though quite simple in its text, but she could hardly comprehend its meaning, so great was her excitement.

"THIS matter," so the second paragraph ran, "has been straightened out with the aid of the Federal government, and we are once again in a position to do our trading among neutral nations. Incidentally the company has just come into a lease of land in Southern California where there are rich potato fields. As your investment in this company covers all industries in which the company may be interested, you will of course share in the enormous profits to be made from these new holdings. On another sheet we are enclosing a detailed statement of accounts, showing deductions for services, and check will be sent you January 2 to cover your half-yearly profits as declared in the directors' meeting of December 15."

The second sheet was a bewildering mass of figures. She saw Costs of Litigation, on Account of Profit and Loss, Federal Fees, Court Fees, Interest Due, and none of them meant anything definite to her save that at the bottom there were three lines of figures.

Dividend of December 15,	$8,324.15
Deductions for above statement.....	3,753.00
Total due Miss Emily Ladden.....	$4,571.15

More than forty-five hundred dollars! And the potato fields would yield big permanent profits!

Miss Emily jumped to her feet with a half-angry exclamation, as if she had forgotten something. She ran down the stairs to the telephone and called up the railroad station. There was a sleeper on the ten o'clock train that would get her in Chicago at eight. She could catch the Twentieth Century that afternoon and be in New York City for Christmas!

She hurried up-stairs and started feverishly to haul her clothing from the various cupboards. For several minutes she sorted vigorously; and then came the thought that she would never pack these things in time for the ten o'clock train. Instead, she brought out two large bags and a dressing-case. She would only go to New York for Christmas and New Year's. Then she would come back to Laddensburg for the rest of her clothing. Somehow the thought of her return pleased her—and she hummed as she chose three of her newest evening dresses—one ordered just before the financial smash and that had never been worn, two or three gowns, a pile of underclothing, and as many of her more elaborate belongings as she could manage.

She hardly stopped for supper, and it was not until nine o'clock that she called up Kendall Stebbins to tell him that she was going. Their conversation was short, almost breathless, and left him half dazed. In fact, Emily herself was half dazed, and she gave such frequent short sharp orders about her house that the two maids presently gave up trying to remember, but trusted that they would do the correct thing until she returned.

She went away on the ten o'clock train to Chicago. Kendall Stebbins saw her off.

IT WAS half-past six Christmas night. Over in the west a golden sickle of a moon was reflected on the banked snow. The church bells were ringing, and about the town there seemed a bustle of preparation.

Kendall Stebbins saw that there was a small stream of people headed for the high school, but he did not hurry. Somehow the salt of the earth had lost its flavor for him in the past two days; not even Emily's assurance that she would come back had filled him with any particular elation. He walked slowly, stopping frequently to look at the moon. He laughed at the way the moon mocked him—the moon that was made for lovers. Imagine Kendall Stebbins in love with Emily Ladden! The moon seemed to say, "Imagine such a thing!"

But just the same it was true!

He went on, slowly, his heavy steps betraying his heavier heart. Fifty people greeted him, and he mechanically returned their greeting. He went into one of the class-rooms off the gymnasium and left his hat and coat. Then he went to the big room that Emily had made so beautiful. Already the hall was beginning to fill. There were men in evening clothes, and laborers in their best corduroys, women in clothes that had meant a trip to Chicago or St. Louis, and women of foreign birth who wore silk shawls of far-across-the-sea texture over cheap silk waists that had been made in New York City. He stood there idly watching them all, and for the first time resentment filled him. He wished that he had never answered the call to return to his native village. He longed for the humming rush of the cities.

A small boy came to him.

"Say, Mr. Stebbins, one of the ladies wants to see you in the playroom downstairs."

HE THANKED the boy and started from the room. Another ice-cream battle to be fought, or possibly it was favors. How he hated them all! everything, everybody! He descended the half-lit stairs to the basement room where the small children played in stormy weather, and found the room a confusion of boxes, tables filled with food, aprons; and in the far corner a woman, who turned and faced him as he entered the narrow doorway.

It was Emily Ladden!

For a minute neither of them spoke. Kendall, staring with raptured gaze, was filled with the wonder of her presence. She was not beautiful; Emily Ladden could never be truly beautiful; but she was lovely to look upon. She was dressed as for a function, the seal and sable coat thrown back from her shoulders disclosing the evening gown of some black filmy material that seemed to float about her as a cloud.

"Emily!" he cried, when he recovered from his astonishment.

"Yes, I'm real," she laughed. "Don't look as if you had stumbled on a ghost."

"But in Laddensburg! I had pictured you in New York tonight."

She smiled at him again.

"Oh Kendall! it's a long story. It may—it may take a lifetime to tell."

He did not speak, but stood enraptured, her words sinking deeper and deeper into his consciousness.

"When I got into Chicago the other morning I went straight to a hotel where I could rest until it was train time. I called up a friend or two, and went Christmas shopping. Christmas shopping—and at every step, Kendall, I was contrasting the mad selfish rush of people with pinched nervous faces with the Laddensburg Christmas. When it was time for my New York train, I could not leave; I could not leave."

Kendall cleared his throat.

"No?" he said, rather inane.

"No. Because I knew I belonged back in Laddensburg. Because of the way you looked at me at the station that night when we said good-by."

"Emily!" He sprang forward, his arms outstretched.

She moved away from him.

"Not here. The others will be here at once. When I changed my mind, Kendall, I went shopping—for Laddensburg. The cases came down on the train with me today. They are being brought up here now. They will have to be opened and sorted—my gifts to Laddensburg."

"And you only got here on the night train?"

"Yes. This gorgeousness was donned in the ladies' room of the Pullman."

There was a sudden confusion outside the door. The Christmas cases had arrived.

"And, Kendall—" she placed her hand on his arm, "I have been thinking of what you meant when you said that there had been so much money in my life that there was no room for things which counted more. You're right, Kendall, you were right; there are things that count more. Come home with me after this Christmas party. I've ordered a Christmas supper—for two."

Girl War Workers Going Home

DEMOBILIZATION of women war workers is being accomplished in truly democratic American fashion.

The little girl in a government office or knitting mill holds the attention of the War Department. Contracts are cancelled or continued that the girl war workers may be assured a chance to live. From each State in the Union, men and women who represent the government are telegraphing to Washington reports on the industrial situation. Justice in the shape of recommendations for adequate notice and extra salary when she leaves government service hold the attention of a cabinet meeting while questions of world policy wait. A bill has been introduced into Congress to supply transportation, on the same basis as that furnished demobilized soldiers, for the army of 100,000 women who have come from the four corners of America to serve their country in Washington.

The story happily lacks the melodramatic quality of an eleventh-hour rescue. There are two reasons: Uncle Sam has recognized the debt he owes to the two million or more women already in war work and the millions of others who were willing to undertake war production.

The second reason lies in the action of the Department of Labor. The nation-wide machinery built up by this agency has recognized women on an equality with men. Women are just "people," with all the privileges of the people of the United States. Threatened dislocation in the knitting industries with their nearly 150,000 women receives the same attention as a similar condition in an industry affecting men. Hosiery mills which were running on government orders have been allowed two weeks' additional work after they finish their present contracts. Long-time delivery is provided for so that the eighty needle machines required for the heavy yarn in soldiers' socks may be shifted into sets of 120 needles as used for the silk and cotton hose of commerce, and no change has resulted to the workers other than in some cases temporary shortening of hours.

In many States, the replacement of women war workers in peace-time industries is being carried on within the States, or with nearby States, without recourse to Washington.

IN THE LIGHT OF THE GREAT WAR A TEXT BOOK ON PROPHECY

By JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.,
Dean of the Moody Bible Institute

THOUSANDS today are interested in Prophecy who previous to the present World convulsion gave little heed to this great subject. The well-known Bible student and expositor turns the Bible search-light on the great prophetic mysteries—using the Scripture revelations as full authority for all his interpretations of the Prophets. It is a timely and highly useful handbook for all interested in unfulfilled prophecy and is especially adapted for Bible classes.

- XXIII. WHY CHRISTIANS SHOULD STUDY PROPHECY

(The Book and How to Use it.)
From the author's preface.

The war with Germany greatly quickened popular interest in the prophetic books in the Bible, and the Christian Herald, New York, asked the author for a series of articles on the subject. They numbered eight, and bore the general title "The Mountain Peaks of Prophecy."

Before the conclusion of the series the attention awakened seemed to justify an increase of the number of articles to twelve, and later that number was doubled.

Questions from correspondents began to multiply, which were replied to in some of the later articles, and as the whole assumed more and more the form of class instruction, the management of the paper urged the present publication in book form for wider and more permanent use.

One or two articles have been omitted here as being rather ephemeral in character and not essential to the rounding out of the subject; but those that appear do so, with few exceptions, in their original order, and with practically no change in the text. Repetitions and recapitulations incident to the serial form of composition have had to be retained, but it is thought these may be found not undesirable where the study of the book is pursued, in classes as is contemplated in some instances, and for which the questions have been added at the close of each chapter.

In the preparation of the work the author sought to avoid as far as possible the expression of merely his own opinions in the premises, and to give Scriptural authority for all his interpretations of the prophets. Where he did not know, or was in doubt he said so, and yet the necessary limitations of space in the periodical may have resulted in a flavor of dogmatism here and there which was not intended.

Generous consideration is asked for this, as the author fully recognizes the merits of other interpretations than his own, and values the scholarship and judgment with which he is not able always to agree.

For His Sake

THE early Jewish patriarchs humbled themselves before God and pleaded with him for increased herds, for lengthened life, and that their enemies might be baffled. Often the prayers, like Jacob's vow at Bethel, took the form of a pledge or vow. "If God will be with me, and will give me bread to eat and raiment to put on, then shall the Lord be my God." Jacob's descendants appealed to God's justice by their burnt offerings and sacrifices. They comprehended divine anger at human sin, but did not rise much above the level of Jacob's bargain. Their goodness was still predicated on divinely sent prosperity, but prosperity as surely led them into sin which brought adversity, new sacrifices of repentance and a new bargain. Even Moses, in spite of his forty days on Sinai, did not seem to apprehend God as other than a just Judge and a patient Patron.

But by David's time men had begun to appreciate a little more fully the true nature of Jehovah. David often sought forgiveness; he often needed it; but he knew God not only as just but as merciful. Gradually men came to be prepared for the full revelation by Jesus, of God as a loving Father, no less just, but dealing in love with those borne down by sin. Jesus did not paint out of the picture the former ideal of justice, of hatred of sin, or of merefulness, but he painted in love and fatherly forgiveness. In place of the sacrificial lamb he offered himself, not for his own sins but for ours; and, though telling us that God knew all our desires and needs before we ask, he told us also to ask in faith, nothing doubting, and to ask in His name.

Jacob bargained with God. We through Christ claim his favor by virtue of the friendship of His only beloved Son. We bring our petitions to the throne of grace, and ere we rise we breathe the aspiration: "for Christ's sake." The Jew thrice daily turned his face toward Jerusalem and prayed. The Mohammedan today directs his five-time prayer toward Mecca. Both thus approach God through the holy places; but we, as Christians, approach him through the holiest avenue of all, the love of his Son, our Saviour.

For Christ's sake we cry, and we rise assured of answered prayer; for he has promised, "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do." Shall we then force God to act by claiming his promise? Far from it! Shall we dare to ask "for Christ's sake" more than for the forgiveness of our sins? Shall we presume, because of his love, to use the petition in his name to our own advantage? No. The very presumption would defeat our prayer. When we have given all to him as he gave all for us, we may claim this Friend at court. When we have held back nothing from his cause, we may say confidently "for Christ's sake."

Christ is our Advocate, not to move God's love to grant us all we need, but to declare us worthy of the forgiveness, the spiritual quickening, the material benefit we seek. Shall we, living unworthily, denying by our lives the profession of our tongues, shall we thus pray? Some of us, feeling our lives insufficient to warrant the Saviour in interceding for us, seek to influence him as we might influence one here on earth, by the interposition of a mutual friend. These seek through some saint to win the succor of which they feel themselves unworthy, and cheat themselves. We cannot cover our littleness and meanness with the cloak of a saint. "For Christ's sake" only is the plea that is heard in heaven, and we can pray thus only as we live "for his sake."

God the Father is still God the Just. God the Forgiver of sins is still Jehovah the Avenger of wickedness. Jesus did not change God, but he did offer to men the alchemy of his Spirit, the solvent of his sacrifice, by which they come to hate sin, to love righteousness, to seek service, and, so far as human may be worthy, to ask worthily in his name.

Individual requests for prayer are noted as follows:

Two hundred and three ask for healing of mental and bodily ailments, with spiritual blessing. One asks that she may be permitted to lead one soul to God each day; one that the Spanish influenza may be stamped out.

Seven pray for the restoration of sight; eight for the restoration of hearing; ten, healing of the mind; twelve, special prayers for mothers, that they may be restored to health.

Seventy-four pray for conversion, of which seventeen are for sons and eighteen for husbands. One wife asks "that husband be converted and that my own life be a living example of the power of God to keep sweet." A friend asks prayer "that I may have new consecration in my heart, and have influence to make a Sunday school class follow Jesus." Another asks, "Pray that I may be a true follower of Christ, and be closer allied to him, and be the cause of saving others." Many ask that their sons in the service may be blessed, and if God's will, kept safe; also that they may not yield to temptation.

Twenty-seven pray for divine grace in financial troubles.

Eight ask to be released from the tobacco and ten from the liquor habit.

Other requests are, "That a church lately organized may sit at the feet of Jesus and learn of him," "for a real spiritual awakening in our church at Lexington, Ohio, and the salvation of our souls"; "that our Sunnyside Church may be helped spiritually as it never has been; also that our pastor be blessed in his efforts"; "that we may get an earnest, sincere, spiritual pastor for our M. E. Church."

Special prayers are asked for a family who have lost three children: one burned to death, one killed by an auto, and one drowned a few weeks ago. May the Lord's presence be with these poor parents, and give them strength to bear the separation which we know is only temporary.

Different friends write:

"Pray that I may be given a deeper work of grace, and power and words to pray in public; that more wisdom may be given me for Sunday school work to win the little ones for Christ, and that I may have more Christian love and patience in my daily life."

"That God will give me strength to surrender absolutely to Christ as my Saviour." "That my father, who has not yet found 'Our Comforting Friend,' may be converted at our coming meeting."

Worth-While Life Purposes

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topics. Prov. 3:1-18

AS WE look back upon the years that are gone we cannot help but realize that many of the things over which we were most enthusiastic were of little worth. Ambitions have destroyed friendships, cravings have remained unsatisfied, the persons we sought to use have disappointed us, and the things for which we reached out have proved to be empty of any satisfaction. One thing and only one has persistently grown better, and that is our Christian life. When our ambitions have been for the glory of God, they have been blessed; when our cravings have been for spiritual things, we have been satisfied. And now we stand on the threshold of a new year. How shall we choose the path our feet shall tread, in order that the twelve months ended may not find us confused and confounded, another year wasted, our idols shattered and our ideals unattained? The chapter given for the reference could not be better as a guide. If we forget not the law, if we forsake neither mercy nor truth, if we trust with all our hearts in the Lord, depending not upon our own wisdom except as it follows his leadership, we can be sure that he will direct our paths, and that they will lead to his glory and to our own joy. Let us put our lives wholly in God's hands, yielding them without reservation to such service as his spirit may lead us to, keeping our hearts open for another's need, our lips clean, our spirits cheerful, praying often and seeking always to know his will and to find ways in which to serve him.

Our Relations to God. Praying

(Morning Watch) Epworth League
Topic. Mark 11:19-26

AS YOU go to your work and meet a friend on the street you say "good morning!" The morning is happier frequently because of cheery greetings thus exchanged. The "Morning Watch" enables us to meet God and to hear his "good morning." Happy messages from him fill the pages of his Book. That life is strongest which is reinforced with the truth, regularly studied, and with unneglected prayer. With many of us, prayer is too often merely a source of refuge or a means of securing our desires. As a refuge it is blessed; as a means to a reward it is sometimes effective. But that prayer only brings true joy to the heart and true strength to the life which seeks neither refuge nor reward, but which expresses merely the cravings of the soul for communion with the Father. There is much more to the spiritual nature within most of us than we have discovered. We wonder at the spiritual achievements of certain saints whose lives are blessings and whose passing on to glory leaves whole neighborhoods un comforted. We seldom realize that the foundation of these saintly lives is most often laid in quiet prayer and communion and in the study of God's Word. We cannot be strong physically without food, nor can we expect spiritual strength without frequent recourse to the two sources of that strength—the Bible and the place of prayer. Since we are largely creatures of habit, the only way to assure ourselves that each day will be blessed with spiritual food is to set aside a definite time which shall be given over to the exercises of faith. Thus we in time form the habit, and the habit forms our lives, and the habit being a good one, our lives are blessed thereby. Nor is the life blessed by the Spirit lived to itself; it blesses others and testifies more strongly for Christ than any word of tongue or pen.

"CAFARD"—that blue war-weariness which sometimes attacks even the cheeriest of people—recently settled on a little French woman in one of the Y. W. C. A. foyers in France. She was usually the gayest, the most spontaneously merry entertainer in the foyer, but this day was the anniversary of her husband's death from a wound received during the first month of the war.

Madame tried to forget, but the cafard had its way, and she slipped off in a corner to shed the tears that could not be driven back. There one of the Blue Triangle girls found her, and tried as best she could to cheer the little Madame, to tell her how great was the sympathy and admiration of all America for the remarkable courage of the French under their heavy burden. Madame smiled a brave little smile, straightened up, and threw a moist handkerchief into the corner.

"Voila, c'est tout," she said, and walked off. The next time the Blue Triangle hostess saw Madame, she was the center of a large group who had magically thrown off their own gloom and were applauding vociferously. Madame was the magic. She had started the victrola, and was entertaining with the infectious gaiety characteristic of the French.

Two Happy Pastorates

January. Other church activities pointed in the same direction—the prayer meeting subjects, the pastor's calls, the occasional special day of prayer (and we even dared to say "of fasting") for a deeper spiritual life and a religious awakening.

In the Week of Prayer itself, what we had been hoping, longing and praying for always came; Christians were revived, souls were converted, and spiritual matters became for a time at least affairs of supreme consequence.

Then came weeks and months of training and ingathering. The "pastor's class" was formed to teach the young converts the duties and privileges and responsibilities of church membership; and gradually, with care and heart-searching, they were admitted to full membership.

In connection with one of these yearly Week of Prayer revivals, in February, 1881, the first Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor was formed, of which I shall speak more at length in another article. Its prime purpose was to train the annual harvest of young disciples for intelligent cooperative church membership, training them in participation in the meetings and in church work, just as the yearly pastor's class instructed them in the rudiments of faith and practice.

These months of special harvesting occupied the rest of the winter and spring months until the summer hegira suspended in part, though by no means wholly, the activities of the church. I believe most thoroughly, and never more now, as I look back from the vantage ground of many years, in some such plan of campaign.

I BELIEVE in a revival, or, if you will, a season of special interest, every year. I believe in evangelists and have no prejudice against them. They are often needed, but I also believe that usually a pastor may be his own evangelist, and have blessed and permanent results from such plans as I have outlined, and far larger results, as his faith and zeal and intellectual power exceeds mine.

I also believe that the pastor should put the burden of evangelism upon his people. It may be easier to do ten men's work than to get ten men to do it, but it is not so wholesome for the church.

This, too, is one of the principles on which the Christian Endeavor Society was founded: that there is a task and a testimony or a prayer for every one, however immature, and that the only way to grow strong is to use what little strength we have.

After seven happy years with my Portland parish, I felt it my duty, after refusing a number of invitations to leave Portland, to accept a call to Phillips Church in South Boston. This was a far different proposition from my first pastorate. The church had been long established as the leading and largest church on "the Peninsula." It had had a succession of noted and able pastors. My immediate predecessor was Dr. R. R. Meredith, a great expositor of the Sunday school lesson, whose weekly Bible class for teachers filled one of the largest halls in Boston.

He was a Boanerges in the pulpit, whose eloquent and thunderous periods I could never hope to equal. He was chiefly instrumental in leading me to become his successor, and I was installed by the same ecclesiastical council that dismissed him from that pastorate.

THE church had seven hundred members and congregations of a thousand or more. It was conservative in many of its ways and traditions, and yet ready for new things. No church could support its pastor more royally and loyally than old Phillips Church.

Moreover, the church was in the midst of a moving and a foreign population, and the community had seen its best days. Though many of the old families one of their own number, while the whole society also met weekly to pray and to plan the work which gave every member, even the youngest, something to do.

In this society many religious leaders were developed, several of the young men entered the ministry, and Dr. William Shaw, so much loved and honored by the young people of the country as the long-time secretary of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, here first showed his genius for leadership.

Thus more than four happy and harmonious years passed away. I do not now recall a ripple that disturbed the unity of the church or the affectionate relations of pastor and people.

Then the growing importance and world-wide extension of the Christian Endeavor movement, involving a vast amount of correspondence and many calls for addresses, pressed me, until I felt obliged, most reluctantly, to resign my pastorate, thanking God for nearly twelve happy years in the Gospel ministry, a calling which I gladly commend to all young men who care more for service than for self, more for usefulness than for money, as I believe the great majority of earnest, upward-looking, forward-looking young men do.

There have been clouds as well as sunshine, rain as well as fair weather, in my life as in every other; but, looking back to my years in the pastorate, I can wish for my young friends no greater happiness than a real call to the ministry of the Lord Jesus Christ.

"Going Home for Christmas!"

By Minnie Leona Upton

"GOING Home for Christmas!" Oh, the magic and the mirth
Thrilling through four throbbing words—four words so wonder-worth!
How the happy pulses leap, and how the eyes shine bright!
How the springing feet keep step to song from morn till night!
How the bores and bothers bore and bother us no more—
Nothing is worth noticing, with such a joy before!
Makes us keen to do our bit to help the sad old earth:
"Going Home for Christmas!" Oh, the magic and the mirth!

"Going Home for Christmas!" My, how pleasant strangers are!
Not a one but has a smile for every jolt and jar!
"Not at all! My fault!" they say, all smiling back at you;
Wonder, now, if they're all Going Home for Christmas, too!
Sort of like to ask 'em, but there's never time to stop,
With everybody shopping, just as hard as they can shop!
Best of jokes are jabs and pokes from bundles in a car!
"Going Home for Christmas!" My, how pleasant strangers are!

"Going Home for Christmas!" What a dream for day and night!
Was there ever dream more dear, and beautiful, and bright?
Nearer comes the time, and now we dream it more and more;
Yet—we never did our daily work so well before!
Can't get tired, somehow, now; and crossness doesn't fit
With the dream that's singing, singing, singing—not a bit!
All the tasks are easy ones, and all the burdens light.
"Going Home for Christmas!" What a dream for day and night!

"Going Home for Christmas!" It's so good it must be true!
Isn't it about time that the jolly postman's due?
Every day or so they write to say we "mustn't fail!"
Just as if we wouldn't walk, in lack of rail, or sail!
"You're coming home for Christmas; the days are all so slow!"
Every day acts just that way at this end—don't we know?
Cross it off the calendar the minute it is through!
"Going Home for Christmas!" It's so good it must be true!

were left, the exodus into the suburbs and the country had begun. The tide was running strongly against South Boston and against Phillips Church as an old-fashioned family and community church. Yet substantially the same methods which built up the Portland church failed not in Boston. The pond was larger if not so exclusive, and the fish more numerous, so that a fisher of men ought to catch more in his net.

Every year the Week of Prayer revival resulted in many conversions. No communion passed without accessions to the church, as had also been the case during the seven years in Portland. During the four years and more of the Boston pastorate more than a hundred new members were added each year to the growing roll-call.

A most flourishing Christian Endeavor Society was soon formed, which became so large that several smaller societies or bands had to be formed out of it, which met once a week with the pastor, but under the leadership of

Shall the Evangelical Churches Unite?

United Church. Others could use the presbyterian and others still the episcopal system. Members of one body would be welcomed by letter to all churches and the validity of ministerial orders being recognized, ministers could pass readily from one system to another. Some of the difficulties will not prove as great, probably, as they now appear. In West China a few years ago, they wanted to form a single united Native Church from the divers systems represented in the various denominational missions. Church of England, Methodist, Quaker, Baptist and other organizations made a situation difficult to adjust, but it was adjusted, because everybody wanted it.

This proposal for the organic union of the Evangelical Churches may have a startling effect. There has been talk about it for many years, and many examples of the value of federation and cooperation have been presented. Fifty years ago we had the Evangelical Alliance on the basis of "In essentials unity, in non-essentials liberty, in all things charity, and the results were salutary. We have had before us for many years the Faith and Order movement of the Protestant Episcopal Church for the reunion of Christendom. The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America has long been in existence and has given a practical demonstration of the benefits of cooperation and federation. The Y. M. C. A., representing all evangelical denominations, has done an excellent work for all.

Of actual organic union there have been many examples: 1. In Canada, of various Presbyterian bodies united in one Presbyterian Church. 2. Of various Methodist bodies in one organization. 3. There is now pending there a union between the Methodist, the Congregational and the Presbyterian Churches, each of these denominations having already voted for it. A similar union of Methodist bodies in England and in Australia has taken place, and further unions are on foot. In this country, the Old and New School Presbyterian bodies were reunited soon after the Civil War; the Methodist and the Methodist Protestant Churches were also reunited long ago. Three bodies of Lutherans were merged in 1917 and three more in November, 1918. Several other union projects are pending. The outlook for organic union, it will be seen, is by no means discouraging.

CHRISTIAN HERALD SUBSCRIPTION OFFERS

Color Views OF THE Holy Land

HERE is a great opportunity for you to secure without a cent of cost ten beautiful reproductions in full color of the most famous and accurate Holy Land paintings that have ever been made. These works of a great artist have preserved to the world the Holy Land of Bible days, that country known and loved so well by our Saviour.

In the past you have known the Holy Land only through the most meager and uninspired dressings, none of them presenting this wonderful country in its true beauty and charm. Now you are offered masterpieces that put before your eyes the entire birthplace of Christianity as Christ himself knew it. For the first time ten of these views in all the beautiful tints and shades of the land itself are offered you absolutely free.

Like a Visit to Palestine

AS YOU look at these pictures you feel that you yourself stand with the artist on the slope of Olivet and look across the valley of Jehoshaphat, through which winds the old road to Samaria, and beyond, under the bright sunshine, you see the walls of Jerusalem. Through these works of art you travel the Jordan road as did our Saviour as many years ago. You visit the Pool of Bethesda, and the tomb of St. James, and feel the charm, the beauty, and the dignity of every sacred place. These reproductions are in themselves a trip to the Holy Land.

David Roberts, of the Royal Academy, made the long trip from England for the purpose of painting the most famous scenes of biblical history in order that the Christian world might have truthful pictures of the birthplace of the religion. He expressed in water-colors the scenes of Christ's life and activities, as well as many things of historical interest in Egypt and the Nile country, the very cradle of modern civilization, which he visited while on his way to Palestine. Reproductions of ten of Mr. Roberts' great paintings have been made and are now offered you free in folio form.

With each of the ten pictures goes a complete description of the scene depicted with mention of the historical and biblical interest that attaches to the place. Every student of the Bible and every person interested in the life and progress of these early days will appreciate the beauty and value of these reproductions, both as works of art and as illustrations of the great scenes in scriptural history.

10 WONDERFUL VIEWS OF THE HOLY LAND FREE

THIS is a special offer and is strictly limited by the supply of the picture folios that have been completed for distribution. Send us the name and address of a friend or relative who is not now a subscriber to the Christian Herald, and to whom you would like to send it. Mail to us with 25 cents, in stamps or currency. The name of the new subscriber will be entered at once for a ten-weeks' subscription to the Christian Herald. The folio of reproductions in color, twenty-four pages, will be sent you free of charge upon receipt of coupon. Send your name also and mail it to us at once, so as to be sure of your folio. Do this now while you are thinking of it. If you prefer we will send the booklet to the new subscriber.

BOOKS THAT SHOULD BE IN EVERY CHRISTIAN HERALD HOME

"JERUSALEM—Its Redemption and Future"

IT IS only now that the real story of the Redemption of Jerusalem can be told and it is that story which the Christian Herald presents in the book entitled "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future." It tells the story in vivid detail of conditions in the Holy City during the war.

The book reads like the unfolding of a vast drama, one of the grandest ever known. The redemption is not confined to Palestine, but includes all the Bible lands; Syria, Armenia, Arabia, Mesopotamia, the old country of the patriarchs, and even the "Eden Land"—the cradle of the human race.

We will send a copy of "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for One Year, for $2.75 ($3.25 after January 1, 1919).

We will send a copy of "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us ONE NEW yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00 ($2.50 after January 1, 1919).

"Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," separately, $1.00 per copy, postpaid.

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY"

Report of the Philadelphia Prophetic Conference

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY" links up the prophecies of the Bible with the great events of today and shows conclusively that we are living in an age of prophetic fulfillment. When we set out several months ago to print "Light on Prophecy," we felt that it was a book which our readers would welcome. It held something that very many good people want to know. The result, however, far exceeded our expectations. "Light on Prophecy" has now passed through four large editions, and the demand is still growing.

We will send a copy of "Light on Prophecy," postpaid together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50 ($3.00 after January 1, 1919).

We will send a copy of "Light on Prophecy," postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us ONE NEW yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00 ($2.50 after January 1, 1919).

"Light on Prophecy," separately, $1.00 per copy, postpaid.

"OH, MONEY! MONEY!"

By Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Pollyanna," etc.

"OH, MONEY! MONEY!" is a romance of a New England Cinderella and a Western millionaire. "If you don't know how to get happiness out of five dollars, you don't know how to get it out of five thousand," says Maggie, the cheery philosopher of "Oh, Money! Money!" and this is the keynote of Mrs. Porter's latest story.

We will send a copy of "Oh, Money! Money!" together with the Christian Herald for one year for $2.75 ($3.25 after January 1, 1919).

We will send a copy of "Oh, Money! Money!" postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers as a reward for sending us ONE NEW yearly subscription in the Christian Herald with $2.00 ($2.50 after January 1, 1919).

"Oh, Money! Money!" separately, $1.50 per copy, postpaid.

MR. MORGENTHAU'S INSIDE REVELATIONS

AS GERMANY is now suing for peace, it is important that the world should know some things she has tried to keep secret as expressed by Mr. Morgenthau. Did you know the war was definitely decided upon in Potsdam on July 5, 1914, 17 days before the Austrian ultimatum to Serbia? Mr. Morgenthau knows. Von Wagenheim, German Ambassador, told him.

Did you know that Germany, a supposedly Christian nation, urged the Turks to make a "Holy War" against Christians? Mr. Morgenthau knows. Mr. Tocheff, the Bulgarian Minister, Germany's ally, told him.

Did you know that Germany is responsible for the deaths of 1,000,000 Armenians? Mr. Morgenthau knows. He was in Constantinople when the killings occurred. This inside history and much more, all significant and breathlessly interesting, is in Ambassador Morgenthau's Story. This book tells why the Turks killed the Armenians and fixes on the Germans the responsibility for the atrocities. It reveals the perfidy of Germany's attempt to start a holy war against Christians. It is a book for now and many years to come. It is the kind of a book that keeps one reading on and on. It is entertainingly written, yet it is packed full of authoritative facts. Illustrated with photographs, maps and diagrams, many of them from Mr. Morgenthau's private collection. Over 400 pages; cloth bound.

We will send a copy of "Ambassador Morgenthau's Story," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.25 ($3.75 after January 1, 1919).

We will send a copy of Ambassador Morgenthau's Story to Christian Herald subscribers as a reward for sending us TWO NEW yearly subscriptions at $2.00 each ($2.50 After January 1, 1919).

NOTICE

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. Correspondents may use a nom de plume to identify the question, but all letters must contain name and address of the writer, in addition to the nom de plume. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters nor to those written with lead pencil.

Questions and Answers

READER, Pennsylvania. I am tempted daily by the thought that, if David committed such crimes and was forgiven, I or anybody else could do likewise. I am in fear and torment day and night, yet I love Jesus dearly. I never, never want to yield to temptation, and I pray God he will make me hate sin and that I will have no desire to do anything contrary to his will. Kindly remember me in your prayers. Do you think I could have sinned against the Holy Ghost? I feel Jesus' presence so much and am happy when this awful temptation is gone; but it returns.

"Resist the tempter and he will flee from you. When temptation comes, fight it, not in your own strength alone, but with the courage and power which will come through prayer. Your experience is like that of many others who find themselves subject to such assaults. You may remember that passage in Pilgrim's Progress where it tells of the temptations that beset Christian as he walked through the valley, all of which were rendered powerless when he prayed. All of us are liable to temptation, but succor is ever at hand if we call for it. As to the unpardonable sin, it is generally held by the best expositors that one who has committed it no longer has regrets or remorse or heartburnings, and cherishes no thoughts of repentance whatsoever. He has become morally and spiritually dead, and is indifferent to the future. Consequently, the very fact that any one is still troubled about his sins and still desirous of forgiveness, is in itself evidence that he has not sinned beyond forgiveness, and that the Holy Spirit is still striving with him to draw him from sin to righteousness.

Greatly Distressed. 1. See our answer to Reader, Pennsylvania, on the unpardonable sin. 2. I John 1:9 emphasizes the assurance of forgiveness of sin and acceptance of the repentant sinner. Concerning the possibilities of a return to Christ on the part of a backslider, we can only repeat that what to man may and often does seem impossible, is possible with God, and that his grace is boundless. Go to him freely, fully, trustingly, and he will give you rest and peace. Do not worry or fret, but go boldly to the fountain-head of mercy and blessing.

E. S. Mohawk, N. Y. The clocks were set ahead one hour last spring, because by doing so there was a saving of artificial light. The clocks were set back to normal this fall when, the days having become shorter, the necessity for the change had passed.

Anxious, Schenectady, N. Y. Are we justified in claiming the promise, "Ask and ye shall receive," where the blessing sought is not spiritual?

The nature of the blessing sought is the criterion. No one who has faith in divine wisdom and love would continue to desire anything which God saw would be injurious for him to have. If one realizes that God withheld the desired object in love, he would be content and would pray no more. Paul, as you will remember, prayed three times for the removal of the thorn in the flesh, and his remarks afterward implied that he ceased asking for it. We are often mistaken in our idea that certain things that we desire will be blessings. God, who sees farther than we do, may perceive that they would do us harm. On the other hand, when the object desired is an undoubted good, as in the salvation of a the Jews had no power to impose the death penalty, that power belonging to the Roman court. The Jews, therefore, being put to finding a reason to bring him before the Roman authorities, trumped up the charge of treason. Thereupon he was arrested by Roman soldiers, who guarded him throughout the trial and finally escorted him to Calvary and crucified him. John 19:23 distinctly says the soldiers crucified him. In all these acts the Roman governor and the soldiery

Christmas in Bethlehem

EACH year, on the birthday of our Lord, the people of the little town of Bethlehem gather about the Church of the Nativity singing carols to him whom angels welcomed. And men and women pilgrims come from east and west to lay the treasure of their love at the feet of the Child of the Manger. The picture shows a portion of the formal procession of the Greek Churchmen entering the building for the anniversary service, which was especially significant this year.

beloved child or friend, the prayers should never be discontinued till they are granted.

Mrs. G. L. H., Columbus, Ohio. The inhabitants of Germany, like those of other countries, have a choice of religious beliefs. There are very many Catholics there; in fact, in the southern states the Catholic is the prevailing religion. The state church, so-called, is "Unirt," meaning united, it being a conglomerate of the strictly Lutheran and Reformed doctrines. Here in America the German element is found largely among Lutherans, Methodists and Catholics, but not exclusively so, as there are many Reformed, Baptist, and so-called "evangelical" churches whose members are of German extraction. Here in America all services should be in English just as soon as it is possible to have them so.

F. C. R., Canton, Ohio. Does not the statement that God gave Saul another heart imply regeneration? How then did he fall away?

It is doubtful if the expression carries so much meaning. It indicates a change in his character, but it was not permanent. He was disobedient and envious afterward. The statement is made later on I Sam. 16:14, that the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, which would account for his rapid declension afterward. He resisted the Spirit and his conduct shows his strong wilful nature, which had never been wholly subdued.

O. W., Antelope, Texas. Who crucified our Saviour, the Jews or the Romans?

Though our Saviour was tried and condemned to death by the Jewish Sanhedrin, were executing Roman laws which the Jews had no power to carry out, but it was the Jews who demanded the execution and accepted all responsibility for it.

M. J. M., Santa Clara, Calif. There are many very good Christians who have been such from childhood. Born and reared amid Christian surroundings, they cannot have the same experience as those who have come into the light in maturer years, it may be after having been without the knowledge of the Gospel for a large part of their lives. The work of the Holy Spirit in one who has had Christian parents has been a constant work, practically from the beginning of consciousness. Like Samuel, they have been trained as children of God and have progressed steadily, obediently and happily in that beautiful relationship, looking for divine guidance in all things, and trusting in Christ and his atonement for forgiveness and acceptance.

B., Nebraska. Letters mailed from "Somewhere in Nebraska," dated July 30, signed "B" and containing $40 for the children of Mont-Lawn, and September 3, 1918, containing $100, half of which was for Mont-Lawn and half for the Bowery Mission Bread Line, reached the Christian Herald and the money was applied as designated. We thankfully acknowledge these gifts, whose generous donor modestly conceals his personality behind the designation "B Fund."

F. C. H., Radcliffe, Iowa. The only passage which has any similarity to that suggested in your letter, is Ps. 22:20. There is no other passage in the Bible that can be regarded as applicable.

Pastor Ernest W. Fitch of The Christian Church, Boone Grove, Ind., writes: "I notice in the Herald of October 2 the remarks of Mr. Charles Young in which he says that the churches must unite. I think that we are all sure that the usefulness of the Church has been limited by the divisions among us, yet I do not see that he has given us much to think about. I note he says 'that the Church has fallen down during the war' and gives as a reason that a 'kingdom divided against itself cannot stand,' and proposes that we select seven men as head of the Church here on earth, seemingly forgetting that the reason for the divisions is the man-made systems and rules of faith and practice. There is no question but that the Churches must unite, and the time of this union is near. Of this we are all sure. The question now is, shall we take upon ourselves to appoint some of our own number over the work of the Lord? He says: 'Upon this rock I will build My Church.' Why not accept Jesus Christ as the Head and his Word as supreme authority?"

Anxious Reader, Attica, Ind. 1. Judgment belongs to God. No amount of discussion would be of any value in deciding such questions; moreover, it would be presumptuous to attempt to decide. 2. See I John 3:8 and see also Rev. 19:20 and 20:10, 15.

A Reader, Otisville, Mich. You have probably been misinformed, or have misunderstood the statements made in the church you mention, regarding foreign missions. Certain comparatively small denominations have given more largely per capita than the big denominations, but it has never been claimed that they gave more in gross than the great denominations, which outnumber them 100 to 1.

C. A. P., Nicollet, Minn. We enjoyed the picture on the October 30, 1918, Christian Herald, by C. P. Rising. What kind of a frame would be suitable for it?

Narrow gold molding, not too ornate, and from half to three-fourths of an inch wide. Frame close, without mat.

WILSON'S MAJESTIC BACON

Wilson's Majestic Bacon may be had sliced, trimmed and daintily packed in one-pound glass jars. This maintains the fine flavor.

Wilson's Majestic Bacon is also put up in one-pound cartons, evenly sliced and trimmed. No waste, and the quality is always the same.

The whole piece of Wilson's Majestic Bacon is favored by housewives who prefer to slice it as they use it.
